Israel prepares for possible Syrian attack

An Israeli soldier stands guard Sept. 9 at an Iron Dome battery near Jerusalem, part of the missile-defence system designed to intercept and destroy incoming short-range rockets and artillery shells, as the United States lobbied for domestic and international support for military strikes against Syria. (Flash90 photo)

JERUSALEM — An Iron Dome battery was deployed near Jerusalem for the first time Sunday as the Israel Defence Forces continued to prepare for the possibility that rockets or missiles will be fired at Israel as a result of a military operation against President Bashar Assad's regime in Syria.

In late August, some 1,400 people were killed – according to American numbers – by an apparent sarin gas attack allegedly perpetrated by the Assad regime. The attack prompted U.S. President Barack Obama to plan a "limited" punitive response that he hopes to obtain approval for from Congress this week.

The decision to deploy the missile-defence platform near Jerusalem was made by the army's top brass following an updated assessment of the situation. The move came only weeks after an Iron Dome platform was deployed in the north, and days after one was removed from the Tel Aviv area.

"The IDF doesn't provide information about its defensive array," the army said in a statement. "The missile-defence system is deployed according to updated assessments."

Sirens sounded in Jerusalem during the November 2012 Operation Pillar of Defence in Gaza, catching residents of the capital off guard. It was the first time in more than 20 years that air-raid sirens sounded in the capital – the last time was during the 1991 Gulf War. No missiles actually landed in the city, but two fell nearby.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and other political and security chiefs have assessed a "low" probability of the Assad regime or its allies hitting Israel in response to a U.S.-led attack on Syria, though Syrian and Iranian leaders have repeatedly threatened to strike Israel if Obama goes ahead with military intervention. Netanyahu said Sunday that Israel remains an island of stability and safety in the unstable Middle East.

Arab League backs peace talks

JTA

Representatives of the Arab League's peace initiative committee expressed support for U.S. efforts to promote Israeli-Palestinian peace negotiations.

U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry, updated a ministerial delegation of the committee in Paris on Sunday on the ongoing talks between Palestinians and Israelis.

Kerry reiterated the commitment of the United States to pursue intensive negotiations to end the conflict through a permanent status agreement, the U.S. State Department said Sunday.

"The delegation expressed its full support for the Secretary of State's efforts and for the agreed upon nine-month timeline," according to a statement released by the State Department.

The ministers also expressed concern over Israeli settlement activity in the West Bank as well as "unilateral Israeli actions in Jerusalem that create a negative environment," the State Department said.

"The delegation hopes that the ongoing direct permanent status negotiations will lead to a resolution that achieves a just and lasting peace through resolving all permanent status issues as a major step towards comprehensive Middle East peace, which will contribute to regional security and stability," the statement said.

Two Firsts In Ottawa

OTTAWA — Or Haneshama, Ottawa's Reconstructionist congregation, inaugurated two firsts in the capital's Jewish community this summer: its new rabbi is both female and gay. Montreal native Rabbi Elizabeth Bolton, 56, is the 75-family, west-end congregation's first full-tme spiritual leader. She was ordained at the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College and previously worked in Baltimore, where she was the first full-time rabbi for its Reconstructionist shul, Congregation Beit Tikvah, from 1999 to 2011.

Ambassador Named

JERUSALEM — The Israeli Foreign Ministry is nominating its director general, Rafi Barak, as Israel's new ambassador to Canada, the Jerusalem Post reported last week. Barak has been in his current post for three years. He replaces Miriam Ziv, who returned to Israel last month after five years in Ottawa. Barak has also served as the No. 2 in Israel's Washington embassy, as well as chargé d'affaires at its embassy in Paris and deputy director general for western Europe. The Israeli cabinet must approve his appointment.

WORLD

Boteach Threatened

NEW YORK — The New York Police Department investigated Kahane Chai, a militant Jewish group, for threats against former TV host Rabbi Shmuley Boteach. Israel's internal security service, the Shin Bet, asked the NYPD's intelligence division to monitor the group in the late 2000s after anti-Boteach comments were posted on Kahane.org, according to internal NYPD documents obtained by Tablet, the online Jewish magazine. "He commits incessant chillulei HaShem and for that IMHO deserves death," a website moderator on Kahane.org wrote in 2007, using the online name Doom777. "Someone shoot Shmuley Boteach," the person wrote a year later. The NYPD launched a "terrorism enterprise investigation" into the postings, enabling it to use informants and undercover officers to monitor Kahane Chai, which the U.S. State Department designated a terror group in 1994. Rabbi Boteach, who wrote Kosher Sex and ran unsuccessfully for the U.S. Congress last year in New Jersey, told Tablet he was never informed of the threats. Nobody appears to have been charged in connection with the postings.

Britain's New Chief Rabbi Sworn In LONDON — Britain's new chief rabbi, Ephraim Mirvis, was installed in the presence of Prince Charles.

Rabbi Ephraim Mirvis

Some 1,400 guests were present at the Sept. 1 ceremony at St. John's Wood Synagogue in north London, where Rabbi Mirvis was sworn in as the chief rabbi of the United Hebrew Congregations of the Commonwealth.

It was the first time a member of the royal family attended such a ceremony. Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, who retired after 22 years as chief rabbi, participated in the rite.

Rabbi Mirvis said he would work to enhance Jewish education, to build and strengthen Jewish communities and encourage social responsibility. He has said he'll make uniting the branches of Judaism a priority.

Rabbi Mirvis, a native of South Africa, is the former chief rabbi of Ireland. He's Britain's 11th chief rabbi since 1704.

Council Drops Plan

BUDAPEST — Budapest city council dropped a plan to name a street after anti-Semitic author Cecile Tormay, a Hungarian who died in 1937. Jewish groups said he "inspired" many anti-Semitic thinkers and leaders in Hungary.

Ve'ahavta seeks help to aid Syrian refugees

Jordan Adler
Special to The CJN

Ve'ahavta – The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee is calling on Canadians to aid around 500,000 displaced Syrians living in Jordan, which it hopes will also foster goodwill between Israel and its neighbours.

The humanitarian group is one of 15 organizations in the Jewish Coalition for Syrian Refugees in Jordan. A sub-group of the Jewish Coalition for Disaster Relief (JCDR), the partnership already donated more than $200,000 to displaced Syrians.

The JCDR estimates that nearly 500,000 refugees have fled from Syria into Jordan since the start of the civil war, and that number could double by the end of the year.

Some of the Jewish organizations delivering the aid, such as the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society, will be transparent about how the money comes from the Jewish community, said Sarah Zelcer, director of international projects for Ve'ahavta.

"We think it's a gesture of tangible support that the Jewish community is offering Jordan at this time of crisis," Zelcer told The CJN. "It's very important to be transparent and open that the aid is coming from the Jewish community, because we want to leverage that goodwill for the sake of Israel's partnership with Jordan."

There have been some criticisms leveled at the coalition for helping enemies of Israel. However, these comments are not strong enough to interfere with the relief effort, according to Ve'ahavta president Avrum Rosensweig.

"I think the Jewish community generally understands that there's a huge crisis here," Rosensweig said. "It behooves a humanitarian organization to respond to it, particularly with the encouragement of the State of Israel."

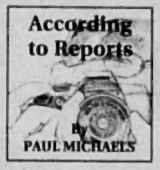
Mutual recognition is the path to Mideast peace



This column was written almost a week before Rosh Hashanah, at a time when the media were consumed with speculation about a pending U.S.-led military operation against Syria over its use of chemical weapons against its own civilians. At that point, what would happen was anyone's guess, which underscored the uncertainty to which we've become all too accustomed.

However, looking back at a piece on a very different subject, written by Hebrew University's Prof. Shlomo Avineri for The CJN's special Rosh Hashanah supplement in 2011, one might conclude that not everything is wrapped in uncertainty.

Under the title, "The roots of the Israel-Palestinian conflict," Avineri, a thinker from the moderate left, looked at factors that have been, and remain, "the obstacles on the road to an eventual reconciliation between Israelis and Palestinians."

Given that almost two years have passed since his article appeared (on Sept. 28 to be precise), it's appropriate, during a period of self-reflection, to revisit his message.

Avineri began with a look at the early development of the idea of a two-state solution for Jews and Palestinians. After recounting the story of the Jewish leadership's acceptance, but the Palestinian and Arab rejection, of the UN's 1947 Partition resolution calling for independent "Jewish" and "Arab" states in British Mandate Palestine as (in Avineri's words) the "only just and fair answer to the conflicting claims of both national movements," he drew attention to the following moral standard:

"[S]ince its own claim for a Jewish nation-state was founded on the principle of self-determination and since this principle is a universal tenet, hence one cannot deny to the other what one claims for oneself." In short, as a matter of principle, those who support Jewish nationhood have a moral responsibility also to support Palestinian nationhood.

A solid majority of Israeli Jews have long supported the idea of Palestinian statehood (as this column has noted on several occasions).

Yet, according to Avineri, "the roots of the Palestinian tragedy, their statelessness and the refugee problem" rest with their rejection of Jewish statehood.

By no means did Avineri absolve Israel of all responsibility for the enduring stalemate in the conflict.

He wrote: "There is no doubt, historical claims and strategic considerations notwithstanding, that the existence of almost 300,000 Israeli Jewish settlers in the West Bank makes it more difficult to reach an agreement than it would if the settlers were not there. While the Israeli settlement drive is not the major obstacle for peace, it certainly does not make it easier to move forward."

"And yet, despite this difficult reality, the major obstacle for peace is still the perception held by most Israelis that at the end of the day, the Palestinians are not yet reconciled to peace with Israel as the Jewish nation-state."

Even the Economist magazine, not known for its sympathetic depiction of Israel, acknowledged this reality back in 2008, when it observed: "It is ironic that the fundamental disagreement between Jews and Palestinians today is not about whether there should be a Palestinian state; most Israeli Jews accepted that long ago. It is about whether there should be a Jewish one."

Avineri explained the persistence of this attitude: "Part of the Palestinian rejectionist response has to do with a wider view current in the Arab consciousness that the Jews are not a nation, but merely a religious community. Part of it has to do with the hegemonic Arab national discourse, which views only the Arabs as legitimate claimants for national self-determination in the region."

The rise of Islamists throughout the Middle East, who utterly reject the concept of Jewish sovereignty, only serves to entrench this attitude.

The task for those who yearn to see fairness and justice for both Jews and Palestinians is to try to create an atmosphere in which the concept of mutual recognition becomes the norm. Short of that, failure to resolve the conflict will unfortunately remain anything but uncertain.

Preparing for the unlikely

As a new Jewish year begins, renewed U.S.-led peace talks continue between Israel and the Palestinians.

Much has been written about the low expectations surrounding these negotiations on both sides.

Certainly, Israelis and Jews have good reason to be skeptical. The resumption of Palestinian violence at the beginning of this century, as well as rocket fire and terrorist incursions following Israel's 2005 pullout from Gaza, are testament to this.

But as Jews, we must always be prepared for the possibility of peace, for the prospect that our enemies may surprise us.

And Israel should always be seen as being open to peace, even as it remains ready to defend itself.

In this vein, it's worth recalling the words of former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, who said that Israel would pursue the peace process as if there was no terrorism and pursue terrorism as if there was no peace process.

Since Rabin's death, the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians has largely been fought to a draw.

The Palestinians and their leaders surely must recognize that despite two bloody uprisings, Israel's resolve is strong and its economy robust. Furthermore, the ongoing campaign to delegitimize the Jewish state in various international forums and in the court of public opinion has been successfully countered by pro-Israel forces who have exposed the apartheid slur for what it is.

The bottom line: this startup nation isn't some Crusader state destined to fade into the mists of time.

Meanwhile, the outlines of a future peace deal have been in place for at least 20 years. They're well known to both sides and all interested observers.

But negotiations are the only way to end a conflict between two peoples who both see themselves as holding indigenous claims to one small slice of land.

Only Israel and the Palestinians can reach an agreement. A solution can't be forced upon them by outsiders.

It won't be what both sides truly want, but we hope it will be what each can live with – an accommodation that doesn't compromise too much of each side's distinct national narrative.

Like it or not, the Palestinians hold the key to Israel being fully accepted among the family of nations. A deal won't solve all the problems in the Middle East – not by a long shot – but it might help marginalize and isolate regional extremists such as Hezbollah, Hamas and the Muslim Brotherhood.

It could also fortify Israel for other challenges, such as the aftermath of Syria's civil war, continuing turmoil in Egypt and the Iranian nuclear threat.

The obstacles are many, not the least of which is the continued refusal of many Palestinians to accept that Jews have a strong historical claim to, and bond with, the Land of Israel. Another major roadblock has been the increased intrusion of Islamist ideology into a conflict that started out mostly as a dispute over a piece of real estate.

So while expectations are low, we should be ready for the possibility, however remote, of a breakthrough.

Consider, however, that if you had told a Jew in North Africa or Poland in the mid-19th century that there would be a Jewish state within 100 years, they likely would have laughed.

So could Mahmoud Abbas become the next Anwar Sadat?

Stranger things have happened.

We can only pray.

Allow all perspectives

I was distressed to read the letter to the editor "Columnist too jingoistic" (The CJN, Aug. 29) requesting that you stop publishing Paul Michaels. Obviously the writer "favour[s] coverage of a broad spectrum of opinion" only so long as the spectrum excludes opinions that he doesn't like. One of the strengths of The CJN is that it covers a broad range of opinions in the community. I don't always agree with the opinions expressed, but I would never suggest that they be suppressed. And to characterize readers who agree with the thoughts expressed in Michaels' columns as being "nasty" is sinat chinam – baseless hatred. (Also, some "Cubans in Miami" have legitimate complaints against the Cuban government.)

'67 borders no solution

Many well-meaning people have decided that if Israel were to return to her borders prior to the 1967 war, the Palestinian-Israeli conflict would end.

When I ask advocates of this concept how they arrived at this conclusion, I receive answers such as that the Palestinians only want the area that was allocated to them in the 1947 UN vote. These people are either unaware of the Palestinian documents and speeches that call for the destruction of Israel, or they don't want to believe these very revealing facts. Neither the PLO's charter, created in 1964, nor Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah party's constitution have ever been modified to eliminate clauses calling for the destruction of Israel.

Palestinian Media Watch (PMW) and Middle East Media Research Institute (MEMRI) monitor PA media and TV. These two wonderful organizations have produced a continuous flow of fully documented translations of Palestinian leaders glorifying and praising Palestinian terrorists who have murdered Israeli and American civilians. PMW and MEMRI have presented us with evidence of Palestinian leaders comparing peace agreements with Israel to Muhammad's 10-year peace treaty with the Quraish tribe, which he destroyed two years after he signed the treaty. They also have presented evidence of Palestinian leaders' statements that a successful frontal attack against Israel is not possible. Therefore, they will destroy Israel in phases.

How can any objective person conclude that the 1967 borders are the solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict when made aware of these salient facts?

Play should be tossed away

I attended the play The Merchant of Venice at the Stratford Festival, directed by Antoni Cimolino and starring Scott Wentworth as Shylock.

To begin with, let's call a spade a spade. William Shakespeare was a bigoted, virulent anti-Semite. Many defenders of Shakespeare have commented that when the play was written much of Europe, as well as England, was anti-Semitic. Therefore, he was no exception.

This theory is difficult to digest. How can a man of letters and intellect, a man who has written about justice, tolerance and freedom for all, write such a toxic play?

The director, Cimolino, decided to set this play in modern times, in 1930s Italy, at a time when Mussolini and fascism ruled the country. Bringing this play into an era of the greatest prejudice and intolerance the world has ever known is a bad mistake. It just perpetuates anti-Semitism to a new generation of bigots.

Shylock was played by a very distinguished actor, a true artist who has been with the Stratford company for many years and has done excellent work in other plays. Unfortunately, Wentworth did not capture the essence of the role of Shylock.

The lines of the play cannot be changed. But an actor of his stature should be able to interpret this role not as a beaten dog or a whimpering degraded character that accepts the curses, intolerance and hate without much protest.

I do not share the view of the defenders of this horrible play that it is presented today in order that the modern spectator, so repulsed and disgusted by it, will say "Never again." On the contrary, this play will encourage a lot more people to anti-Semitism.

Let's just throw this bigoted piece of trash in the dustbin where it belongs.

Leo Frank tragedy resonates a century later

Abraham Foxman
JTA

On the occasion of the 100th anniversary of the trial of Leo Frank in Atlanta, let's begin by stating for the record: no, the Leo Frank case was not the impetus for the founding of the Anti-Defamation League.

It is true that the organization, now celebrating its centennial, was founded the same year as the arrest and trial of Frank for the murder of one of his factory workers, a 13-year-old girl named Mary Phagan. But the idea for ADL, conceived by Sigmund Livingston, a Chicago attorney, preceded the case.

Abraham Foxman

Rather than being the catalyst for the organization, the trial served as a confirmation of the wisdom of Livingston that American Jews needed an institution to combat anti-Semitism.

America was a much different place in 1913. Compared to Europe, Jews here lived far more secure and stable lives, but stereotypes and name-calling were still common. That's what led Livingston to conceive of an ADL. As a Jewish immigrant from Germany, he assumed that in America, the prejudices he experienced in Europe would not exist. That was not the case.

Still, the trial – and two years later, Frank's lynching – were a shock to American Jews. Despite broad divisions between older immigrants from Germany and newer ones from Russia, the community rallied together in support of Frank and in anger at the biased trial.

Looking back, we can see this great tragedy as representing the two sides of America and the Jews that still exist today, but in a very different balance and form.

The trial and lynching demonstrated that America carried some of the historic stereotypes and conspiracy theories about Jews that had characterized European life for centuries. The blood libel charge – the idea that Jews murdered Christian children to use their blood for ritual purposes – was rare in America. But a related theme, of a Jewish predator attacking a young Christian female, surfaced in the Frank trial.

Also surfacing was the notion that in an extreme case like this, America's legal and constitutional system might not be able to protect a vulnerable Jew from violence.

In the long term, one can argue that the reaction to the Frank affair set the stage for a dramatic improvement in Jewish life in America. Newspaper editorials across the country overwhelmingly supported Frank. Opinion-makers commented about the degree of anti-Semitism surrounding the trial. Even early on, Jews understood that an influential public could be called upon for support when anti-Semitism reared its ugly head.

Leo Frank as seen in video from National Museum of American Jewish History [Screenshot]

The opprobrium did some good, leading Georgia governor John Slaton to commute Frank's sentence. However, the haters won out, as they so often did in those years in the case of African-Americans.

For American Jews, the Frank affair was seen as a low point in Jewish life in America. The truth is, however, that the most difficult years came later, particularly in the 1930s when anti-Semitic hate groups proliferated and when quotas in universities and other institutions abounded.

The lessons of the Frank affair played an important role in improving the quality of life for American Jews and in decreasing anti-Semitism.

If there were doubts about the need for an ADL, it evaporated among significant parts of the community after the lynching. And it set the stage for the fundamental practice used by ADL and others in combating anti-Semitism: get the information out and rely on the good will of public figures and institutions to delegitimize hate and prejudice.

Clearly, America has come a long way in the last 100 years. A Leo Frank incident is unthinkable today. Attitudes, legal protections, education – all these speak to a qualitatively different America for Jews.

Yet the Frank affair still resonates. Anti-Semitism in the extreme, a completely biased trial and the lynching, may largely be things of the past. But the stereotypes that underlay that extremism are still alive. ADL surveys show that 15 per cent of Americans – 35 million people – still have anti-Semitic attitudes.

One hundred years later, we are saddened by the memory that it could have happened here, pleased that America has come so far and recommitted to addressing those still living biases, some of which allowed the travesty that was the Leo Frank affair.

Abraham Foxman is national director of the Anti-Defamation League.

Jerusalem Mayor Nir Barkat deserves our support

Gil Troy

Jerusalem Mayor Nir Barkat is running an intense re-election campaign, and he deserves worldwide support. Anyone who can donate money legally – meaning legitimate, voting-eligible Israeli citizens, whether or not they live in Jerusalem – should. And non-citizens should lend their support in other ways, making it clear that Jerusalem already has the right mayor, whose term should be extended.

It is, of course, legitimate to ask why non-residents of Jerusalem should care, about a local municipal election 10,000 kilometres away. The answer, of course, has to do with the magic of Jerusalem and its link to the Jewish People. For 3,000 years, Jerusalem has been our capital, religiously and politically. This golden city is where our collective soul resides. When that city suffers, be it from Roman conquerors or Palestinian suicide bombers, we all bleed. And when that city thrives, be it under the legendary mayor Teddy Kollek or his worthy successor Barkat, we all rejoice.

Once, I was walking around Jerusalem with my dear friend from Montreal, Rabbi Pinny Gniwisch. As we wandered, I showed him the parks, walkways, schools and museums that had been built with donations from abroad – emphasizing the many Canadian-financed good works you can see wherever you wander.

"It's remarkable," I said, "to consider the generosity of Jewish people all over the world for a city so far away from so many of them."

Pinny responded: "But Jerusalem is the Jewish people's shared synagogue. Of course we all feel connected and committed."

Supporting Jerusalem is both a religious and secular act. Wherever one stands religiously, Jerusalem looms large in the Jewish soul. The very fact that it's a place with spiritual power, historical resonance and emotional meaning for so many Jews – and so many different kinds of Jews – attests to the broad bandwidth of Judaism itself as a world religion with a national dimension that consecrates both time and space.

But for all of Jerusalem's poetry – and there are many of us whose heart still beats faster when we drive up to the entrance of the city from Highway 1 – the prose of Jerusalem is about the challenges of managing a modern multicultural municipality that must run smoothly.

Barkat has mastered both these missions. He understands that the mayor of Jerusalem must be the custodian of the city's special heritage. But he also understands that the mayor of Jerusalem must be the manager of the city's thoroughly pedestrian problems. As mayor, he has worked hard to resurrect the city as a cultural centre and a destination for tourists, from the rest of Israel and abroad. At the same time, he has worked hard to restore the city's economy, clean the streets, fix the roads, tame the bureaucrats and raise morale.

In late October, Barkat won't just be running for re-election, but Jerusalem's vote will be seen as a referendum on the city's future. There's a struggle going on between haredi power brokers who want to bully city hall and a broader coalition of citizens supporting Barkat. And there's also a power struggle between national politicians trying to advance their partisan agendas and the coalition of those who care about their city who are mobilizing for their incumbent mayor.

That's why Jews from all over the world, and especially Canada, should endorse Barkat's re-election heartily, and as generously as they can, within the limits of the law. The mayor of Jerusalem automatically becomes a prince of the Jewish people. Although Jerusalem's citizens are the only ones who can and should vote in the election, it helps to hear from others that this man has been a worthy leader, honest and incorruptible, smart and insightful, visionary and activist. And given how many Canadian Jews are investing in Jerusalem, supporting the Jerusalem Foundation, and helping to build and beautify the city, the Canadian Jewish voice should be heard.

Hakarat hatov is a great Jewish value, and supporting a successful politician is a basic democratic value. Jews from all over the world, in Israel and beyond, should take this moment to say, "Thank you Nir Barkat, we value what you have done and will do what we can to support your re-election," be it symbolically or substantively.

Step up expression of chesed and tikkun olam

Urban Writer
Avrum Rosensweig

The Jewish People have a generous nature, and I am often encouraged by the kindness I see within our community. I urge everyone however, to step up your expression of chesed (kindness) and tikkun olam (repairing the world) activities in 5774 because there is an awful lot of work to be done, and lots of room for people to manoeuvre.

The Torah says, "ani k'mait," that a poor person is like a dead person. The "deadness" this phrase alludes to is the drained energy and a waning hope within the sprit of the impoverished. Worrying about your children's gloveless, cold fingers is numbing. And you are awake the entire time. Being poor might in some ways be worse than being dead.

I have met families in our community whose dinners are David Copperfield-sparse, void of greens and heaped with starch. They are aniyim. The Toronto Jewish community now has soup kitchens, an anomaly a few short years back. We have a fund to top off welfare for low-income families distributed by Jewish Family & Child. Our poor population is big, and our services reflect that. Poverty in general across the nation is growing as well. According to Statistics Canada, between 1980 and 2005, median earnings among Canada's top earners rose more than 16 per cent, while those in the bottom fifth saw their wages dip by 20 per cent.

(Compelling note: I've asked my colleagues what those with lots of money have that those with little do not, and vice versa. One said the rich can dream with the belief that [their dream] can come true. The poor must survive and shelve the life of their dreams. On the flip side, those with little money learn to move through the complexity of the human condition, which the rich don't do as much as because they are frequently ensconced in the management of things.)

In 5774, I therefore call upon you to work on eradicating poverty from the Canadian Jewish community, the State of Israel and the world in which we live. While this may seem naïve to some, know that lofty goals are the only ones to have. Our own Judy Feld-Carr saved Syrian Jewry, and Israel and the Diaspora rescued former Soviet Jews, Ethiopian Jews, Romanian Jews, former Yugoslavian Jewry and now the last vestige of Yemenite Jewry. Remember that the Rotary Club pledged to wipe out polio and is pretty close.

If eradicating poverty is simply too much to consider, fair enough. Find a family whom you can adopt as an equal, and figure out together how you can spiritually, emotionally, mentally and physically barter what each of you have.

One of the greatest gifts we can give any human being is to truly appreciate and understand their journey and share what we have, including a story or a loving embrace. Find that family and ease yourself into their culture and allow them into yours.

Equality here is key. Nobody is a better human being because of what he or she owns, or do not own. We say that the poor are special. They are, it's said in Yiddish, "pintala Yids" (simple Jews, generally understood as grander), and we often honour the wealthy, showering them with accolades for having money. Both ideas are rubbish. People are not great or otherwise simply because of their economic status but because of what they accomplish with their lives, at whatever level they are at.

In 5774, hang out with a person who needs a friend. Who? Ask your rabbi. There are lots of people waiting to hold your hand as you listen, particularly seniors. In 5774, learn about those whose house is open to others. Mimic their behaviour until you get it. Be curious about the family who fosters a child and ask yourself, "Couldn't I do the same?"

Hachnasat kallah (helping a couple to be married). Native Canadians. Mentorship. The refugee issue. Jewish-Muslim relations. Israeli victims of terror. The Roma. Slavery and child labour. Advocacy. Religious-secular relations. Homelessness. The shut-ins. Reading to the blind. Shul committees.

Did you know Toronto has the only yeshiva for deaf youth in the world? Help them out.

In 5774, step up. Stretch your goodness. Done well, your job will be challenging and painful at times, but it will be purposeful. And therein lies the essence of being a Jew.

Good luck. Shanah tovah.

TTC considers anti-Israel ads

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The Toronto Transit Commission is reviewing a proposal by the group Canadians for Justice and Peace in the Middle East (CJPME) to run an anti-Israel ad that depicts the Jewish state as an insatiable occupier.

The development comes on the heels of a similar ad campaign sponsored by the Palestine Awareness Coalition that is currently running on Vancouver's transit system.

The Vancouver bus ad, titled "Disappearing Palestine," show four maps spanning 1946 through 2012, which suggest Palestinian land is being overtaken by Israel.

CJPME president Thomas Woodley did not immediately return a request for comment, but he told Now magazine that his group raised $35,000 from private donors to run the ads in Toronto and other Canadian cities.

Woodley said the group's ad would be similar to the one currently running in Vancouver. It will include the same four maps that ran in the TransLink ad, but with different text.

A TTC spokesperson confirmed that the commission "is still in the process of reviewing the ad in question," but did not elaborate further.

However, a 2009 Supreme Court ruling in another case, involving TransLink and political advertising sponsored by the Canadian Federation of Students and the B.C. Teachers Federation, struck down portions of the transit agency's policy against political advertising.

"Not liking an ad, or an ad being controversial, isn't grounds for removing an ad," the TTC's Brad Ross told Now. "The Supreme Court of Canada's been very clear on that."

Howard English, senior vice-president of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, said the TTC has a lot to consider when deciding if it should run a political ad, especially one that marginalizes a community.

"The ads that ran in Vancouver take an extremist view of the Middle East and those ads are designed to question Israel's right to exist," English said.

"The TTC has to determine what is in the best interest of its passengers and the kind of precedent it will set by permitting ads like this," he added.

"As soon as the TTC approves one set of ads, which takes a far-reaching, and we believe, an extremist position on the Middle East, it will be under enormous pressure to approve other ads as well. That's one of the criteria they have to consider."

TTC policy dictates that if at least five people complain about an approved ad, a three-member advertising review committee will be forced to revisit the issue.

But English said the TTC also has to consider legal issues – whether it has the right to ban political advertising.

Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies president and CEO Avi Benlolo warned that his organization would use its resources to produce a counter-ad if the TTC approves the CJPME ad.

But he hopes it won't come to that.

"We are confident that reason will prevail and that the TTC will not permit the system to be used to promote hatred and lies, particularly against the only country in the Middle East that supports democracy and human rights for all its citizens," Benlolo added.

"The ads are so misleading," English said. "They're really historical fantasy. There is no resemblance between historical truth and the maps that are on the Vancouver transit system right now."

The Vancouver ad, which costs $15,000 to run for four weeks, is in a Vancouver SkyTrain station as well as on 15 buses.

Despite opposition from Jewish groups who contend that the ads are offensive, TransLink, the government transit agency that allowed the ad to run, said on its website that the ads don't violate human rights and comply with Canadian advertising standards.

Citing an article about the Vancouver ads that ran in last week's CJN, Toronto Councillor James Pasternak wrote on his Facebook page that he "will vigorously oppose these ads on the TTC and request their removal from SkyTrain in Vancouver.

"The messaging is false, deceptive, demonizing and discriminatory. We don't need the importation of world conflict zones on to public transit."

Rejecting an ad campaign would not be unprecedented for the TTC.

In 2011, it declined to run an ad by the Toronto Jewish Film Festival that depicted Moses stepping out of a limousine and inadvertently flashing his blurred out genitals to the paparazzi. In 2009, TTC rejected ads by Ashley Madison, a dating website that facilitates extramarital affairs, that said, "Life is Short. Have an Affair."

Shurman ousted as finance critic

CJN Staff

Ontario Opposition Leader Tim Hudak has removed Peter Shurman as the Progressive Conservative's (PC) finance critic, over a $20,719 housing allowance.

Shurman, a former talk radio host who represents the suburban Thornhill riding, lives in Niagara-on-the-Lake. Members of Provincial Parliament living outside a 50-kilometre radius of Queen's Park are entitled to a housing allowance for residences they occupy while working at the legislature.

Hudak said in a statement Sunday night that although the allowance did not violate regulations, it could become a distraction at a time when the PCs are promoting a message of respect for taxpayer dollars.

Analyst sounds warning against 'creeping sharia'

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Here are a few items you may have missed if your sole source of international news was the mainstream media.

In Tunisia, a France-based imam known for promoting Jewish-Muslim relations was assaulted and called a Zionist. In the United States, the Syrian Electronic Army hacked into an U.S. Marine Corps website and argued Americans should not take Al Qaeda's side in its war with Syria. And in Texas, legislators proposed a bill that would recognize Nidal Hasan's Fort Hood victims as casualties in a war, and not, as the Obama administration has asserted, victims of workplace violence.

The items appeared on Jihad Watch, a website operated by Robert Spencer as a program of the California-based David Horowitz Freedom Center. Spencer is author of a dozen books, among them two New York Times bestsellers, The Truth About Muhammad and The Politically Incorrect Guide to Islam (and the Crusades).

"The [mainstream media] has shown a general unwillingness to discuss the motives and goals of jihad attacks," Spencer said in an email interview with The CJN. "The Society of Professional Journalists has guidelines instructing journalists to dissociate Islam and jihad from stories about Muslim terrorists. This creates a peculiar and pervasive unreality."

Spencer started the website in October 2003, "because I was looking for a central location for jihad news and commentary. I didn't find it, so I started it myself."

Robert Spencer

He will be in Toronto on Sept. 17 at the Hilton Toronto/Markham Conference Centre and Spa along with blogger Pamela Geller. They're being brought to Toronto by the Jewish Defence League (JDL) of Canada. The hotel announced last month that it would not rescind the booking, despite receiving a letter from the National Council of Canadian Muslims (NCCM) – formerly the Canadian branch of the Council on American Islamic Relations (CAIR) – that called Geller and Spencer "notorious xenophobic activists."

Spencer and Geller are co-sponsors of Stop Islamization of America and the Freedom Defense Initiative. Both have been called Islamophobes, a label he rejects. There is even a website, Spencer Watch, dedicated to "exposing" him, questioning his credentials and calling Horowitz "a prolific builder of far right institutions and organizations."

"Government and media are complacent in the face of a growing jihadist threat and are far more concerned with stopping phantom 'Islamophobia' than with protecting the freedoms of their citizens and preventing the next jihad attack," said Spencer. "Hence the demonization of those resisting jihad terror."

One example cited by Spencer was the Boston Marathon bombing and the failure of the "politically correct FBI… to evaluate properly intelligence it received from Russia on Tamerlan Tsarnaev. They said he was a jihadi, but the FBI is forbidden to study what exactly that means. So they gave Tsarnaev a pass."

The Obama administration's record in addressing radical Islam is "abysmal," he continued. "Obama mandated the scrubbing of U.S. government counter-terror training material of all mention of Islam and jihad in connection with terrorism in 2011. I doubt the Canadian government is this wilfully ignorant, but it is unlikely to be significantly better."

Spencer agreed with the premise there's an agenda of "creeping sharia" at play in which Islamic norms are being insinuated into western societies.

"The Muslim Brotherhood stated in a captured internal document that its work in the United States was a 'kind of grand jihad in eliminating and destroying western civilization from within' so that 'Allah's religion is victorious over other religions.' That's not an agenda of creeping sharia?" he asked.

Spencer said when human rights commissions in British Columbia and Alberta agreed to hear complaints by Muslim groups against journalists Mark Steyn and Ezra Levant, the "commissions were, wittingly or unwittingly, pursuing an agenda of placing criticism of Islam beyond the pale of acceptable discourse."

Asked whether he agreed with U.S. Mideast analyst Daniel Pipes' formulation that "radical Islam is the problem and moderate Islam is the solution," Spencer replied: "If moderate Islam existed, it would be the solution.

"Right now, while there are many moderate Muslims, there is no mainstream sect or school of Islamic law that teaches that non-Muslims and Muslims should live together peacefully as legal equals in a secular society, or that women should have equal rights with men, or that apostates from Islam have a right to live. Until such a mainstream sect or school emerges, moderate Islam cannot be the solution because it does not exist."

Sukkahville competition set for Sept. 22

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

An awards ceremony for the six winners in the Sukkahville 2013 design competition will be held Sept. 22 from 2 to 4:30 p.m. at Mel Lastman Square.

Spiral Sukkah*, by Jason van der Burg, Dave Freedman, Duncan Sabiston, David Whyte, Jesse Hao of Toronto

Sponsored by the Kehilla Residential Programme (KRP), the third annual competition invited architects, students, artists, builders and allied design professionals – there were 18 submissions – to design proposals for temporary, free-standing sukkahs to be built in Toronto. The sukkahs will remain on display until Sept. 24.

KRP is a non-profit housing agency whose mandate is to identify and champion housing initiatives responsive to the needs of the Jewish community in the Greater Toronto Area. It has been a leader in the development of many affordable housing initiatives, as well as offering property management services for community housing projects.

Sukkahville 2013 participants were encouraged to re-imagine the traditional notion of the sukkah with a contemporary design, language and approach.

All funds raised through the Sukkahville initiative will be used to supplement KRP's innovative rental assistance program, which bridges the gap between market rental rates and what the poor in our community can afford to pay.

Ombres Lumineuses*, by Katrina Novak and Duc Tran of Toronto

"Kehilla holds Sukkahville to highlight the housing needs of the vulnerable right here at home. The statistics are shocking," said Nancy Singer, KRP's executive director.

"Sukkahville is a fantastic, fun event. These are not your zaide's sukkahs. Everyone should come out and see them. You will be amazed.

The event includes the design exhibition, treats, family fun and music by Klezconnection.

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

Forty years ago Stephen Speisman, then a history student at the University of Toronto, launched the Ontario Jewish Archives (OJA) in a room in the basement of Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue – a room that was sometimes used in the evenings by waitresses to change into their uniforms before synagogue social events.

This month the archives takes over a room perhaps only marginally bigger in the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre to display an exhibit of 29 photographs on the occasion of the archives' 40th anniversary.

Director Dara Solomon chose the photos from the OJA's massive collection of about 100,000 photographs. "It took me quite a bit of time to narrow it down," she said. "I talked with the other archivists at the OJA and found out some of their favourites. We wanted to avoid showing the ones that get published over and over again, and show some that had never been seen before, including some new acquisitions."

Although small, the exhibit touches strategically on many important aspects of Jewish communal life, not only in Toronto, which is its main focus, but also in the towns of Hamilton, Peterborough, St. Catharines, Jackson's Point and Owen Sound, which are represented by one photo apiece. "Each photo was chosen to help tell a larger story," Solomon said.

Appropriately, considering the time of year, the earliest photo (1910) shows a large group of Jews lined up along the Toronto lakefront for the Rosh Hashanah ritual of Tashlich, symbolically casting one's sins into the water.

While there are no photos of the old Ward neighbourhood where most of the Jews of Toronto lived in the World War I era, there are numerous photos of Kensington Market in the 1920s, 1930s and later. Subjects include Perlmutar's Bakery, the Kiever Synagogue, a fruit market on Augusta Avenue, a creamery on Kensington and a picketer wearing a Yiddish-language sandwich-board for an Ontario Poultry Buyers strike in 1939.

Several photos of women and women's organizations trace changing fashions as well as the community's move northward in the postwar era. There is a group photo of Pioneer Women (later Na'amat) in stylish hats in 1940, a woman proudly showing off a cabbage roll at the Hadassah Bazaar in 1959, and ladies crowding the kosher meat counter at the newly opened Steinberg's supermarket at Sheppard Avenue and Bathurst Street in 1968.

The exhibit is far too small to adequately reflect what's in the OJA's vaults, but it offers a nice foretaste. As many as 25,000 photos are expected to become viewable online after the OJA launches its new website, an event scheduled for next January.

The Ontario Jewish Archives at Forty: Four Decades of Collecting and Sharing Our Community's History continues at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre Gallery, Bloor Street and Spadina Avenue, until Oct. 3. Admission is free. Prints of most of the photos are available for $10.

Za'atari camp houses over 120,000 refugees

The coalition is giving $50,000 to Israeli Flying Aid to bring food and sanitation items to refugees in the Mafraq camp. It will also supply $50,000 to World Jewish Relief and Save the Children, which collaborated in an effort to offer food to 500 refugee children at the Za'atari refugee camp for one month.

Za'atari currently houses more than 120,000 refugees, its high population stemming from its close proximity to the Syrian border. Camps such as Za'atari are built to hold a certain number, but due to the high influx of refugees, there are overcrowding and health problems.

A UN report in April said children in the Za'atari camp didn't have enough to eat, while three in four young refugees did not attend school and lacked proper clothing.

The coalition will also give $50,000 to the International Rescue Committee, which plans to provide training to medical service providers.

The JCDR has responded to crises in Haiti, Sudan, Japan and Sri Lanka. Rosensweig said that when Ve'ahavta and other groups aided Sri Lanka's eastern province in the wake of the December 2004 tsunami, civilians who were historically against Israel ended up embracing the Jewish groups as they helped to rebuild hospitals.

"By the time we had finished our work [in Sri Lanka], some of the little children were walking around wearing T-shirts with Israeli flags on them," Rosensweig said.

Although some Jordanians opened their homes to displaced Syrians, the nation of seven million will likely have a hard time absorbing too many refugees from a country with a population of 22 million.

"There's a lot of concern right now about Israelis being worried about an attack from Syria... you're providing aid to people who aren't supportive of Israel," Zelcer said.

"However, living in Jordan are extremely vulnerable members of the population. It's very important as a member of the Jewish community to stand up and say we're going to do this. This is part of who we are as a community."

Montreal community pays tribute to good cop

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Jewish community bade a fond farewell to a police officer it considers a good friend: Sylvain Bissonnette, who was commander of Station 9 serving Côte St. Luc, Hampstead and Montreal West for nearly seven years.

A reception was held Aug. 27 for the well-regarded Bissonnette at Federation CJA just before he left the post to take up his new command of Station 8 in Lachine this month.

Sylvain Bissonnette

The federation's chief operations officer, Moshe Ben-Shach, spoke warmly of, not only Bissonnette's close co-operation with the Jewish community, but of his interest in and efforts to understand it.

Ben-Shach recalled that the first time they met was soon after Bissonnette came to Station 9. The federation's annual March to Jerusalem was departing from Cavendish Mall, and members of the anti-Zionist haredi sect, Neturei Karta, were holding a demonstration.

Bissonnette wanted to make sense of Jews protesting against Israel. "We talked for about four hours about the different facets of the Jewish community," recalled Ben-Shach, who was impressed by Bissonnette's quick grasp of the complexities.

From then on, the two worked closely together on many files – some public, some not – including the incidents of synagogue vandalism in 2009, 2010 and 2011.

"You were always available to listen and support, and you instilled that in your team," Ben-Shach said.

Bissonnette was a familiar figure at community events, such as the annual Yom Hashoah commemoration.

Ben-Shach described two important projects the federation completed with the help of Bissonnette over the past year. One is an emergency-preparedness plan developed in conjunction with Station 9 and Côte St. Luc's public security department.

"We hope it will never be tested, but it's comforting to have it in place," he said.

The other is conducting drills in schools to prepare students and staff for what to do if there is a gun shooting.

"This will go a tremendous way in making our community safer," Ben-Shach said.

"He was always there to offer security and reassurance when something was happening, whether at holidays or sad events, like vandalism," said Rabbi Reuben Poupko, spiritual leader of Congregation Beth Israel Beth Aaron in Côte St. Luc.

"He was always thoughtful and considerate."

In a jocular mode, typical of the easy relationship between the two, Rabbi Poupko added, referring to the PQ government's proposed values charter and its possible ban on displays of religion by public servants: "You're getting out just before you have to arrest someone for wearing a kippah."

Bissonnette, a 24-year veteran, was visibly touched by the tribute. He thanked the federation for its constant collaboration.

He said he came to Station 9 with the belief that the police should serve all of the population and that it's important to form partnerships with local political and communal institutions.

"I knew the Jewish community was important. I wanted to know your needs, your ways, your history, your roots, your traditions," he said.

"I wanted to do everything in order that history not repeat itself. That was my mission, and I made sure my officers understood it."

As a history buff, he was already knowledgeable about the Middle East and conscious of the risk of a local reverberation when an incident happened there.

"It's important to be pro-active," he said.

As a token of appreciation, the federation has planted five trees in Bissonnette's name in Israel.

Indeed, the Jewish National Fund is an organization he is well aware of: its office is in the same building as Station 9.

The Côte St. Luc city councillor responsible for public security, Glenn Nashen, told The CJN that Bissonnette "showed great understanding and sensitivity to not only the Jewish community but the greater community, its multicultural and aging [characteristics]."

His co-operation with city officials was exemplary, he said.

"I've worked with five station commanders, and I'm saddened to lose him," Nashen said. "He's an outstanding leader."

One project that stands out for him is Bissonnette's encouragement and assistance in the launching of a volunteer citizens' patrol about six years ago.

Made up mainly of retirees, the patrol is the only one of its kind in Quebec, he said. Bissonnette recognized the vCOPS (volunteer Citizens on Patrol) as an asset, not a hindrance, to the work of the police.

"He was a partner in this project from day one, helping with the planning and training. It's in great part due to his vision and willingness that Côte St. Luc has the lowest crime rate in the Montreal agglomeration," Nashen said.

Last Winnipeg Conservative shul goes egalitarian

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Sky Kneller made history Aug. 24 when she became the first woman to receive an aliyah at the Chevra Mishnayes Synagogue.

"It was quite an honour," said the 22-year-old whose family are long time members of the Winnipeg congregation.

Four days earlier, the 105-year-old congregation voted overwhelmingly to introduce fully egalitarian services, becoming the last Conservative synagogue in Winnipeg to do so.

The Chevra Mishnayes Synagogue is an unassuming shul that has continued to go about its business over the years without ever having had the benefit of a rabbi or full-time paid staff. In an earlier interview, vice-president Robbie Waldman credited the synagogue's ability to continue to the strong sense of family and chevra that has always been fostered there.

"To my mind, it's all about continuity," Waldman said. His family has been part of the shul since 1926, while current president Marshall Kneller is the fourth generation in his family to be a member.

Last year, about 220 people attended High Holiday services. Treasurer Murray Greenfield said membership is currently about 200. At its peak about 10 years ago, the number was closer to 300.

The congregation began in a house in the old north end in 1908. In the early 1960s, the city expropriated the land the synagogue stood on to make room for a low-cost housing development.

In 1971, the members of another old north end congregation, Ohel Jacob, closed their doors and merged with the Chevra Mishnayes. In 1980, the congregation welcomed Gerry Daien as its cantor, a role he continues to fill to this day.

Ten years ago, the longtime Orthodox congregation voted to allow mixed seating. "It was a tough issue," Waldman said. "We polled our members twice. We even contacted all the people who only come for Yom Tov."

The decision to introduce egalitarian services followed the same pattern of extensive consultation and discussion over several years.

"Some of the women wanted to be able to play a larger role in the service," Marshall Kneller said. "Last year, the subject was brought up for discussion at our annual general meeting. We brought the issue to our board for discussion and sent our surveys to all our members before we put it to a vote."

He said the congregation has seen immediate positive results from the decision. For the first time in years, he notes, the congregation has had enough people for a Slichot service.

"In the past, we had women with us for Slichot, but not enough men for a minyan," he said.

Greenfield said community members who aren't part of the congregation have also expressed their approval for the change.

"We already have a few new people coming for [the High Holidays]," he said.

Kneller added that while High Holiday services will still be in the traditional style, women in the congregation are looking forward to participating fully.

"We will be having more English and more responsive prayers where women can lead the service," he says.

"We are beginning to see an increase in Shabbat attendance and are hopeful that attendance will grow over the year."

General Assembly Mission to Israel

Register for the Mission and the GA by October 2nd and get a special offer - $200 OFF!
$3,975 land cost per person based on double occupancy*

Don't miss this amazing opportunity to attend the General Assembly being held in Jerusalem for the first time in 5 years with over 3,000 Jews from all over the world!

The General Assembly (the GA) is an annual gathering of Jewish Federations of North America and Jewish Communities from around the world held each year in November where the major issues affecting the Jewish World and Israel are discussed. This year's GA in Jerusalem will no doubt be an amazing experience, especially as part of UJA Federation's exciting and unique Mission.

Hear from a remarkable constellation of Israeli leaders who are changing the world and blazing new trails in politics, philanthropy, business, religion and culture.

Confirmed speakers include: Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Finance Minister Yair Lapid, Minister for Jerusalem and Diaspora Affairs Naftali Bennett, El Al CEO and Former Commander in Chief of the Israeli Air Force Eliezer Shkedi and CEO of SodaStream International Daniel Birnbaum.

The GA will culminate as we celebrate the centrality of Jerusalem to all Jews when we walk from Safra Square at Jerusalem's City Hall to the Kotel, and on to our closing gala at the Davidson Center (adjacent to the Kotel).

In addition, the UJA's Mission will include spending 3 days in Tel Aviv and enjoying a unique Shabbat experience; taking part in exclusive briefings with some of Israel's leading politicians, journalists and philanthropists; attending a performance by the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra; and travelling to UJA Federation's partnership region in beautiful Eilat where you will see how your UJA support has transformed this vital and flourishing region. Extensions are available. Enjoy luxury accommodations at the Carlton Hotel in Tel Aviv and the David Citadel Hotel in Jerusalem.

Rights group keeps government's feet to the fire

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Israel resides in a rough neighbourhood where human rights, equality and democracy are pretty much absent from the political agenda.

Not so in Israel though, where a host of NGOs keep the government's feet to the fire, making sure it complies with the norms of a modern, democratic and pluralistic state.

One of the most notable among them is the Association for Civil Rights in Israel (ACRI), an Israeli organization that has been advocating for human rights for more than 40 years. Over the years, the organization has addressed issues ranging from due process under the law, equal benefits and treatment for minorities, including Israel's Arab minority, gender equality, freedom of religion, freedom of expression, and gay and lesbian rights.

It has also come under fire for its strident critiques of Israeli policy – so vocal that some say it is lending ammunition to Israel's enemies. According to NGO Monitor, ACRI has asserted that Israel illegally annexed Jerusalem after the 1967 war; it has referred to Route 443 as an apartheid road; it has used the word apartheid in reference to Israeli policy in Hebron, and it has called the security wall a violation of international law.

But the topic on the agenda of Hagai El-Ad, ACRI's executive director, during a visit to three Canadian cities will be the ongoing dynamic of Israel as a Jewish and a democratic state. He will speak in Toronto on Sept. 20 at the Toronto Reference Library and then address audiences in Montreal and Vancouver, under the auspices of the New Israel Fund of Canada (NIF).

Hagai El-Ad

NIF executive director Orit Sarfaty said that the "NIF funds [ACRI] programs that deal with domestic social issues." The "flagship program" is a legal hotline that provides advice to people who might otherwise not have access to legal support.

"It's fighting on behalf of marginalized communities in Israel," she said.

A second ACRI program funded by NIF is one that subsidizes lawyers working in the area of civil and human rights. These lawyers spend a year studying at the Washington College of Law – supported by the NIF's American branch – and then one year as a sort of apprentice in Israel. The Israeli leg of the program is funded by NIF of Canada.

"It's creating community civil rights lawyers in Israel," Sarfaty said. "This initiative has changed the face of the legal community."

ACRI's scope goes far beyond those programs. Recently, it has been concerned about a proposal that the Knesset consider legislation called "Israel as the Nation state of the Jewish People," El-Ad said.

While the proposed legislation's contents are in flux, ACRI is concerned that as a "basic law," it will shape future laws and require courts to make decisions that put Israel's Jewish character ahead of its democratic one, he said.

The tension between the country's democratic nature and its Jewish heritage "has always been a current theme in the context of the fight for equality in Israel," El-Ad said. "Every decade, every year brings new aspects and challenges to this question."

Today, there's a balance between the two tendencies, but attempts to change that would mean "the Jewish nature would take precedence over the democratic nature. We're dead set against that."

The debate, El-Ad continued, has been going on since the creation of Israel in 1948. "It's part of a lively conversation about the nature of Israel and democracy. It's a constructive tension. Sometimes it's less constructive."

"It's like breathing the air in Israel."

ACRI has been in the forefront of advocating for Israel's Arab minority, El-Ad continued. That community faces discrimination in the provision of services, housing, infrastructure, welfare services and other government benefits.

"We live in a reality where discrimination and the fight for equality is always present," he said.

Equal rights for all Israeli citizens are guaranteed in the country's founding documents, he noted.

El-Ad provided a detailed rebuttal to the NGO Monitor charges.

Like it or not, he said, "according to international law, unilateral annexation is illegal. Not one government, including the Canadian and U.S. governments, recognizes the annexation of east Jerusalem, which is why both [countries'] embassies remain in Tel Aviv. The fact that this simple judgment by Israel's strongest allies is ignored by many in the Jewish community does not make it less true."

As to the security barrier, "any state has both the duty and the right to defend its citizens," El-Ad acknowledged. "But the barrier, along many kilometres, was designed and eventually built within the West Bank. ACRI and others have petitioned the High Court in quite a few cases, fighting on behalf of Palestinian villagers who would have found themselves and/or their lands beyond the security barrier …if it were to be built as planned. Notwithstanding the fact that building the fence on Palestinian territories is indeed a violation of international law, Israel's High Court failed to recognize this.

"Still, in a number of cases, including ones litigated by ACRI, it was possible to convince the justices that the security claims presented by the State in order to justify the route of the barrier east of the Green Line, on Palestinian land, were false. In these cases, the court ordered a re-routing of the barrier, further to the west, closer [to] or on the Green Line [the 1949 armistice line].

"Still, as a result of building the barrier mostly within the occupied Palestinian Territories, 85 per cent is built within the West Bank itself, not along the Green Line. Approximately 10 per cent of West Bank land has been de facto annexed to Israel."

El-Ad defended ACRI's use of the term "apartheid."

"This term is far less controversial in Israel, where leaders including former prime minister Ehud Barak and President Shimon Peres have used it to warn of the eventual outcome of occupation… Indeed, Justice [Dorit] Beinisch expressed her dissatisfaction with regard to the fact that in ACRI's petition against the segregated Highway 443, the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (article 3) and the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid were mentioned. Still, in that case, our petition was accepted [and] little has changed with regard to Palestinian access to the road."

"One of the main challenges in [advocating for human rights] is that a growing number of people in Israel identify human rights with the other – the enemy. Hence, people become less fond of human rights. We hope to undo that process."

El-Ad said human rights apply to everyone: "This is about protecting all people, including people we dislike."

Figure skater has eyes set on Sochi Olympics

David Grossman
Special to The CJN

Hard to believe, but even as a toddler, Dylan Moscovitch had a passion for success.

And now, just about a year away from turning 30, he's one of the bright Canadian stars on ice.

While there may be Jewish figure skaters – Max Aaron is the most notable as the current U.S. men's champ – this is not a sport that has caught the attention of young Jewish children in Canada.

You have to go back to the days of Louis Rubenstein to find a very competitive Canadian Jewish figure skater. Some people still refer to Rubenstein, who died in 1931 in Montreal, as the father of Canadian figure skating.

But the focus now is on Moscovitch.

His parents took him figure skating when he was an infant, and today he's not only the top Canadian Jewish figure skater – he's also eager to do well at the Winter Olympics just six months away in Sochi, Russia.

Moscovitch, who is of Romanian descent, doesn't spend much time off the ice. He practises at the Kitchener Waterloo Skating Club, and when he gets a rare day off on weekends, he returns to his home in Toronto.

As difficult as skating can be, it becomes quite a bit more challenging and demanding to have to work on routines and succinctly match strides with his partner, Kristen Moore-Towers, a St. Catharines, Ont., native who is eight years younger than him.

The talented duo placed fourth with a stunning performance at this year's world championships held in London, Ont.

Far better than an eighth place showing two years earlier.

"I have never enjoyed competing so much in my life as right now," said Moscovitch. "There is this urge, this passion to keep the success going."

While the easy part may be lacing up a pair of skates, figure skating requires precision, timing, practice, good coaching and commitment – between three and seven hours a day, and often six days a week.

Knowing that all good things don't last, Moscovitch is aware that his skating days will end one day and he'll want to move on "to a job that is fulfilling and challenging."

But for now, the focus is all on the world stage. "The Olympics are the priority," he said.

"I think of my age, and while 2018 is a possibility, the attention is now. There are aches and pains, but that comes with being an athlete. You just have to push the body a bit more."

It has been a season filled with many brilliant displays of athleticism and some tough struggles.

Moscovitch once competed in singles and moved on to pairs with his sister, Kyra, who gave up skating.

But magic started to happen when he teamed with Moore-Towers in the spring of 2009.

"The girls' job is to shine – they're the painting," Moscovitch said. "My job is to make my partner shine. It's really about showing her charisma. I'm the lucky one, skating with such a talented partner."

Moscovitch grew up in Parkdale, in the west part of Toronto. He attended Fern Avenue Public School and the Downtown Alternative School before taking his high school studies online, linking with sports specialty programs at Vaughan Road Academy and Northview Heights Secondary School .

"I didn't grow up with Jewish friends and [I had] little tradition," he recalled. "I attended a secular school and had my bar mitzvah with a group of others."

After one of his sisters went on Birthright, Moscovitch, the oldest of four children, decided he would learn more about his heritage and decided to do the same thing in 2011 – a few months before he and Moore-Towers won the Canadian championship.

"Life can be such a great journey, but it's also loaded with challenges," he said.

"Medals are great. Athletes want to win, and I am one of them, but making my friends and family proud of me – that's a huge award," he said.

A CALL TO

Dear Friends

As we approach the High Holidays, our thoughts often turn to family and to prayer with an appreciation we do not have the rest of the year. Through the outreach of young Israelis in communities around the world, we have the chance to connect with Yizkor.

Each gift to BGU is a transformative investment that supports students, facilitates scientific discovery and research, and contributes to development of the Negev. Every donation has the potential for significant impact – within the Negev, in the State of Israel, or around the world, now and in the future.

and prepares student volunteers to enter into community during times of crisis to offer physical, psychological and emotional help to those in need.

The project began several years ago and with the support and commitment of Prof. Rivka Carmi, the President of BGU, significant infrastructure has been put in place. Born in Israel with a universal application, this program not only prepares BGU students to work in Beer-Sheva and the surrounding areas but is also intended to be used in crisis situations around the world. It has been adopted by the World Health Organization and communities world-wide; many of the first responders at the July 15 Boston Marathon bombing were trained at BGU.

More than 600 students began the second semester of our Yizkor project at BGU already upon the conclusion of the bombing, returned to their studies and worked in their community helping those in need. Because of the preparatory work done during calmer times, within two hours, hundreds of student volunteers were equipped to offer immediate help and support.

Join us in supporting the most valuable project while honoring your loved ones at Yizkor this performing a double mitzvah. With you as our partner, we can show the students and staff at BGU, as well as the citizens of Beer-Sheva that the Canadian associates of BGU are here to support them.

With a thriving economy in the center of the country, the true pioneers in Israel today are those helping to develop the Negev, of which Ben-Gurion University is a critical component. Please take the time to fill in and mail the pledge form below or support this project online at

May the coming year bring health and nachat to you and your family and peace to the people of Israel.

Therapist explores connections to autism

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Andrea Axt is a study in contradictions.

The Belgian-born 76-year-old Holocaust survivor boasts a PhD in chemistry from the University of Warsaw, is cited in European scientific journals, teaches every year in Warsaw and/or Israel, has studied child psychology extensively and has a deep and abiding love for children.

She has also spent a lot of time scientifically researching the role she feels the human pineal gland may play in autism, Down syndrome, and other disorders.

In addition, she has participated in many conferences, among them an autism conference at Mount Sinai Hospital in New York City.

But the scientific side of Axt stands in contrast with the Andrea Axt who, for the last 35 years, has used "polarity" and craniosacral therapies, both of which are alternative medicine, homeopathic techniques that incorporate massage and the mind to unleash "energy" in the human body and make people feel better physically, emotionally, and spiritually.

Axt has used these techniques to treat a number of conditions, including childhood autism and depression.

Critics dismiss such "therapies" as pseudo-science and bunk. But not necessarily everybody. Even the Autism Canada Foundation lists craniosacral massage and homeopathy as therapies used treat autism, regardless of their scientific bona fides.

Serious influencers of Axt's work have included analytical psychology founder Carl Jung and child psychologist Bruno Bettelheim. And Axt, for her part, sees no contradiction between her scientific background and her sincere faith in "alternative" therapies.

"There is nothing wrong with seeking alternatives," Axt said. "I have always had a leaning towards spiritual things, and I have been doing these things – researching, teaching, therapy – successfully for many years."

Axt's website, www.securenet.net/members/aaxt, for example, clearly shows how she considers homeopathic medicine just as legitimate as any other.

In the case of the cause of autism, though, Axt has been more scientific in her approach, looking at the condition from a neuro-chemical perspective

It is Axt's theory, as it is described on her website, that autism is a "reversible disorder involving aspects of the body, mind and spirit.

"It is influenced by genetic susceptibility, but is not a genetically determined, unchangeable brain disorder. By systematically addressing all the factors that create disordered functioning in an individual's body-mind-spirit, autism can be reversed."

Axt puts a special emphasis on the brain's pineal gland, the first gland that forms in a developing embryo, and "which affects all the systems of our body."

Axt contends that her research into autism has revealed lower levels of melatonin, the main neuro-hormone produced in the pineal gland.

"Problems in autism stem from malfunction of the pineal gland and a disturbed melatonin pathway," Axt wrote in a 2011 PowerPoint presentation she gave in Israel.

Whether the science world will end up supporting her theory is another matter, since that would require a large amount of funding and proof on a large scale.

Meanwhile, Axt continues her work, training, teaching and researching.

Hillel at Western: chicken soup to your door

Jessica Pollock

Guest Voice

Dear parents and families of Western students: as the Hillel president at the University of Western Ontario for the 2013/14 school year, I want to take this opportunity to tell you my Hillel story, which began in the late summer of 2010.

I was moving to London, Ont., from Toronto to enter my first year at Western. I had a strong Jewish upbringing from my 12 years of Jewish schooling, six years at a predominantly Jewish camp and many years of involvement in my synagogue, where my great-grandfather, grandfather and uncles were founding members. At the time, I thought my Jewish identity – which was strongly based on my love of Judaism and the State of Israel – was complete and unlikely to develop even further.

Oh, was I wrong.

That first year, I was encouraged by some friends to join Hillel and subsequently became involved on the executive council as co-president of first-year students. Since then, I've held many different executive and council positions at Hillel.

When I first told my parents that I was becoming involved with Hillel, they were thrilled that I was going to continue my involvement with the Jewish community in London. As you may know, Western is home to a pluralistic community of approximately 3,000 Jewish students – many of whom are passionate about Judaism and Israel.

At Western Hillel, we are committed to providing meaningful Jewish experiences that serve the diverse needs and interests of the entire Jewish student population. Some of our latest initiatives fall under our new objective of bringing Hillel right to students themselves, and often, right to their front door!

Picture this scene: it's the peak of exam season, and your son or daughter is exhausted due to countless nights studying late at the library. He or she feels under the weather and dreams of Bubbie's chicken soup – the best kind of medicine – magically appearing at his or her front door. Well, before you can even say "matzah ball," Hillel will deliver a container of homemade kosher chicken soup right to your child's door, at no charge! Just sign up at www.westernhillel.com/csoo.

A second scene: you receive a call from your son or daughter complaining that his or her stress levels are through the roof. Worry no more. Hillel can help alleviate your child's stress by providing them with an exam survival kit. Upon request, we'll deliver a basket filled with exam essentials (pens, cereal, tea etc.) to your child's residence.

Another program we carry out is Shabbat Across London (SAL). The goal is to conduct, on a single night, scores of Shabbat dinners among Jewish students in London. Groups or individuals who sign up to host dinners are given a package filled with Shabbat candles, two loaves of challah, a bottle of grape juice and a specially designed prayer book. Through SAL, Hillel provides students of all denominations and backgrounds with the tools and training to bring Shabbat into their own homes.

Last year, as Hillel's vice-president of Jewish life, I was given the opportunity with others to plan and carry out one of the most successful Holocaust Education Week programs ever held at my university. Holocaust education and remembrance happens to be a cause very close to my heart, largely because three of my four grandparents are survivors with remarkable stories of fortitude and heroism. Without Hillel's backing and encouragement, I would never have had the opportunity to pay tribute to my grandparents while also educating Western's student population about the Holocaust and its lasting impact.

My involvement with Hillel during my first year at Western connected me with older Jewish students who had already grown accustomed to university life. Forming close friendships with these older Hillel members certainly eased my transition from Toronto to London.

For that reason, apart from our social, cultural, religious, charitable and Israel-related programming, my executive council and I will be focusing on increasing our outreach and engagement strategies. Based on my own experience, it's easy to recognize the value of creating meaningful and personal relationships with both new and returning Jewish students.

For that reason, whatever your child's passions or interests may be, the door of our Hillel House – conveniently located outside the university's gates – is open at all times, filled with an experienced support network of professionals at your disposal.

Whether your son or daughter is looking for the means to safeguard the name of our indispensable State of Israel or the opportunity to preserve and enhance Jewish values and customs, Western Hillel is available to ensure that every Jewish student's voice is heard on campus.

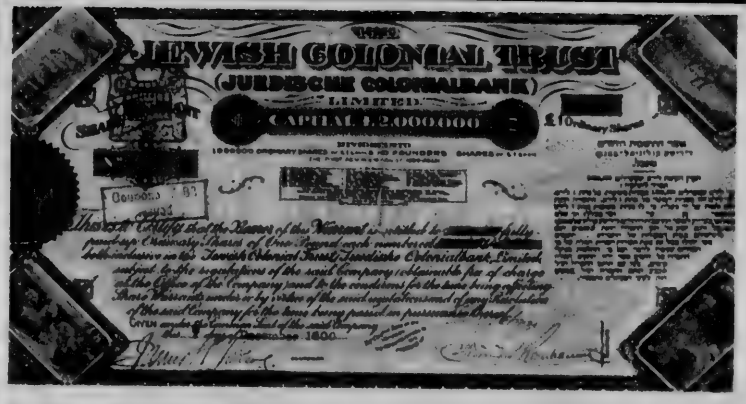
I look forward to the opportunity of welcoming your son or daughter to a new year at Western Hillel, one that's sure to be fulfilling, productive and rewarding.

Shanah Tovah!

HASHAVA
the Holocaust Restitution Company of Israel

Are you an Heir?

60,000 assets of Holocaust victims were located in Israel and are waiting to be claimed



Thousands of Jews across Europe invested in pre-state Israel before the Holocaust. These proud Jews believed in the dream of a Jewish state so they opened bank accounts and bought stocks, bonds and real estate. Many tragically perished at the hands of the Nazis. Their investment did not.

60,000 of these assets have been located by HASHAVA the Holocaust Restitution Company of Israel. HASHAVA is now seeking rightful heirs, many of whom live in north America.

Many of these assets are Jewish Colonial Trust (JCT) shares. JCT was founded in 1889 by Hertzl and the Zionist movement in order to create a financial instrument for the Zionist enterprise. Indeed, JCT had a critical role in the establishment of the State of Israel.

Our Jewish day school closed – just before the new year

Karen Skinazi
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

Three years ago, I was living in Edmonton, and my oldest boy was in kindergarten at a Jewish day school. The school was fine – neither spectacular nor terrible.

I sent him there because, frankly, it was the only Jewish game in town. But in my mind, I was going to send my kids to a great Jewish day school one day, and, anticipating a move to the American Northeast, where Jews are far more numerous than in Canada's oil patch, I looked for an institution that matched all of my needs – a school that prioritized "mensch-iness," offered excellent academics and would provide peers from across the Jewish spectrum. It turns out there was just such a place, in a prime location in Manhattan. I called it up.

"How old are your children?" I was asked. I told the head of school that my oldest son was 5-1/2, my middle son was 3-1/2, and my youngest was irrelevant for the moment.

"I assume the oldest has taken his ERBs?"

"His huhs?" At that time I hadn't heard of the Educational Records Bureau assessment test for independent school admission.

"It's too late," she said, "if he's already 5-1/2. And we're full."

A flat rejection, before I'd even told her we were going to be a family of five living, at the time, on a pitiful academic salary and needing something in the ballpark of a 100 per cent tuition subsidy!

When we realized New York wasn't the panacea for our Jewish needs, we opted, ironically, for the WASPiest part of New Jersey: Princeton (as luck would have it, my husband and I both eventually got jobs at the university there). We found a lovely heimish day school that was kind of far, but it wasn't full and didn't require academic testing.

Instead, the school happily took us in – mid-year at that – gave us tuition assistance, sent a bus right to our door and made us a part of its little family.

It was Solomon Schechter Day School of Raritan Valley.

Our school called itself Conservative, but we were pleased to see it had a range of kids, from the tzitzit crowd to heretical types (like us). It's where my oldest learned to read and write Hebrew fluently in the first month of Grade 1 (before English!); where the kids in his class so loved the "Ariot" Hebrew curriculum that one hosted an "Ariot" birthday party (take that, Chuck E. Cheese!), and where everyone knew everyone's name, from kindergarten through Grade 8.

All was good. Only all was not good.

The school wasn't competitive – it couldn't demand ERBs or declare itself full – because, like many U.S. suburban Jewish day schools, it was low on students and high on debt. Behind closed doors, the same people who approved our tuition subsidy were realizing that it was impossible to run a school on the revenue they had. At its peak, the school, which opened its doors in 1981, had more than 300 students, and perhaps most of them had paid in full. This wasn't the case in 2013.

An email announcing an emergency meeting went out to parents on Aug. 6, three weeks and two days before the first day of the 2013-14 school year. Preoccupied with my own preparations for the year, I didn't pay much attention. But other parents, apparently recognizing this wasn't your typical "Here's the updated calendar" or "School supply lists can be found here" email, thought to ask what the hell was going on.

The next morning, a second email arrived. I read it three times, thinking I must be misreading it.

"Dear parents," it read, "I would like to apologize for the cryptic nature of the email that I sent about tomorrow's parents' meeting. I should have realized how unsettling it would be to receive such a message without any details… Unfortunately, I have to confirm what is, for all of us, the worst possible news for our school. Based on our current financial situation, the board has voted to begin the process of closing down the school, effective immediately."

What followed over the next week was a seemingly endless series of communications and miscommunications. First, the school was closed "effective immediately." Emails began pouring in about other Conservative options. Another Solomon Schechter school, 20 minutes further away from us (our school was already 35 minutes from our house – without traffic), was inviting our students to come. It would honour all financial aid packages and offer free busing. Then, a second Schechter school, more than an hour from our house, made a nearly identical offer. There was something vulture-like about how quickly the schools were moving in on our displaced students. Here in suburbia, we weren't competing to get into Jewish schools, the schools were competing for us.

I allowed myself a day of mourning, then I began to make some calls.

I found a school across state lines. "Hi there," I said. "I'm in the market for a new school. Do you do gifted and talented?"

"Of course," the head of school replied. "This is a Jewish school. I'm told all our kids are gifted and talented."

This sounded promising. "Can I come see the place?" I asked.

We arranged a time. An hour later, an email landed in my inbox. Another emergency meeting at Schechter. This would be the third of its kind. But for what? Weren't we closed? To wrap up loose ends? To berate the board for mismanagement? To sit shivah? Why go?

I went. There was a big crowd of parents, rabbis, community leaders, ex-board members and former parents. New plan: if we could pull together, we wouldn't close. Come Aug. 29 (or maybe Sept. 9), if we were all still around, we would open our doors. If we'd all work together, we'd find a way to be financially solvent, and we'd get back the students who had been eyeing other schools. Almost everyone was supportive. People pledged to raise money. People pledged money on the spot. Teachers agreed to take wage cuts. By the end of the night, close to midnight, I had hope: the school might actually be saved. The doors of the school might open after all.

We felt proud that we had banded together and saved a day school, an establishment that not only educates Jewish children in secular America, but also acts as the glue for the community.

Funding they got, but loyalty they lost

The next day, I went to see the other school, just in case.

It was beautiful: purple walls in the girls' Sephardi-inspired beit midrash; an Israel room featuring computers representing Haifa's Silicon Valley, as well as more traditional Jerusalemite fare; a Holocaust library with the kids' own family photos, and a big indoor jungle gym for when wee ones want to blow off steam in the winter. Orthodox feminist Blu Greenberg is regularly consulted about meeting the demands of its religiously diverse student body. I told the principal I was impressed, and that I'd let him know if we'd be coming once we saw what happened with Schechter.

But what was happening with Schechter? No one knew.

We counted the kids who were saying they'd return. There were about seven in each grade. Six other kids for my kid to play with. Three other boys for each boy to do boy stuff with. The parents had scattered, with many registering at that other Schechter school, which stressed that it would not only honour financial aid and offer free busing, it was also stable.

Another emergency meeting was scheduled for Aug. 15, exactly two weeks before school was supposed to start. This one was announced with an email saying the school would be opening.

Come on in!

But by then, the school, which boasted more than 120 students in 2012–13, had only about 40 students saying they'd be coming back. The meeting ran long and late, and again, the optimism was heady. The next morning, emails and phone calls abounded: the doors will open! We did it! We raised lots of money and ruach (spirit)! It's a go!

And yet when pushed against a now-open door, my husband said what too many other parents were also saying: we couldn't do it, because the school was no longer the school of 2012-2013.

We couldn't send our kids there, not without critical mass for our kids' classes. Not without the teachers we'd be coming back for. Not without the bus that would save us three hours of driving each day.

By the time Shabbat rolled in – a mere 13 days before the first day of school – another message came. Dear parents, our doors won't open after all.

Funding they got, loyalty they lost. Open and shut, open and shut, open and – because people could never be sure the doors wouldn't shut yet again – forever shut.

Solomon Schechter of Raritan Valley is no more.

I'm a little jealous of those schools in Manhattan that have more demand than they can meet. That's not the case in most of New Jersey, nor in Pennsylvania. And it's probably even less so as you get further away.

Here, Jewish friends look at me with disdain as they ask why I'm sending my kids to Jewish day school. I want to ask them: "Don't you want your children to know where they come from? To be able to pray with a minyan? To know how to sing Od Yishama at a wedding, or read from the Torah at their bar and bat mitzvahs in non-transliterated Hebrew? To dream through the stories of I. L. Peretz and S. Y. Agnon? To explain the differences between the destruction of the two temples?"

But I don't say this, because this isn't New York. There, the doors on the Jewish schools – heavy, solid, stable – open narrowly and only admit those who meet their criteria. Here, the doors fling open wildly, admitting everyone, but they're flimsy, without enough will, belief or funding to give them strength. With a gust of wind, they slam shut. For good.

The Bronfman Jewish Education Center (BJEC) is seeking an experienced professional to galvanize Jewish groups in our diverse community around a shared passion for Jewish education broadly defined. Under the direction of the Board of Directors, the Executive Director will be a catalyst for planning and implementing a bold vision for Jewish education and identity in Montreal that weaves formal, informal and experiential education into a coherent whole to reach and inspire all segments of the Montreal Jewish Community.

Key Responsibilities:

- Working with the Board of Directors, develop a strategic plan aimed at identifying a broader role for BJEC as a leader in building Jewish education and identity in Montreal.
- Develop expertise and awareness of trends and model practices in Jewish education including emerging modes of engagement, and ensure that programs and services in Montreal are both responsive to community needs and reflective of state of the art approaches in the field.
- Strengthen relationships with community institutions including Jewish Day Schools, camps, synagogues, federation staff and providers of complimentary education for youth, young adults and families with a view to assisting in the development of educational frameworks necessary to meet their goals.
- Foster and model a creative, accountable, success-oriented and positive environment and organizational culture.

Candidate Profile:

- Minimum of 10 years' experience in Jewish communal formal and informal education.
- Steeped in Jewish knowledge, meaning and learning.
- Understanding of the complexities of the Jewish educational and identity arena and conversant in the trends and emerging models in the field.
- Proven leadership with the ability to clearly and convincingly articulate the mission of the agency and motivate support.
- Strong management skills
- Demonstrated planning and organizational skills with the ability to develop and implement strategic initiatives.
- Knowledge of French and Hebrew an asset.
- Possess outstanding written and oral communication skills.

Interested candidates are invited to submit their resumé along with a cover letter, by email, to the attention of the search committee at searchcom@bjec.org, no later than September 30, 2013.

To play or pray: Yom Kippur and sports

Jewish & Digital
Mark Mietklewicz

Yom Kippur is a time for soul-searching for all Jews, and that has certainly been true for a number of Jewish athletes from the worlds of baseball, football, tennis and even chess who have grappled with the question: to pray or to play?

Baseball

Let's start with the most famous dilemma: the Los Angeles Dodgers' Sandy Koufax. Would he pitch against the Minnesota Twins when Game 1 of the 1965 World Series fell on Yom Kippur? To get a real taste of what Koufax's decision to sit out the game meant to North America Jews, don't miss a lovely clip from the documentary Jews & Baseball: An American Love Story. [http://bit.ly/ksports1]

Decades earlier, the Detroit Tigers' Hank Greenberg made headlines in deciding not to play on Yom Kippur while his team was in an American League pennant race. His decision was immortalized by poet Edgar Guest in the Detroit Free Press: "We shall miss him on the infield and shall miss him at the bat/ But he's true to his religion – and I honour him for that!" [http://bit.ly/ksports2]

Football

For University of Wisconsin Badgers left tackle Gabe Carimi, the question was whether to fast just before an evening game against Iowa in the Big Ten Conference opener. Carimi fasted. He then played. And he won. "Religion is a part of me, and I don't want to just say I'm Jewish. I actually do make sacrifices that I know are hard choices." [http://bit.ly/ksports3]

Carimi credits another Wisconsin player, Matt Bernstein, who also decided to fast right before taking on Penn State. Bernstein then chose a very unorthodox method to get rehydrated for the game. According to ESPN, "The Wisconsin junior feasted on a pregame IV bag, and during the game, moved on to turkey slices, fruit and the Penn State defence." [http://bit.ly/ksports4]

Tennis

Last month, the Israel Tennis Association refused to play a Davis Cup match against Belgium on Yom Kippur. The International Tennis Federation ordered the Israelis to pay more than $13,000 to cover the cost of adding a day to the tournament. The Israel Tennis Association proclaimed, "As an institution that represents the State of Israel and its values, we... stand proud, before all those who refuse to recognize the importance of the Jewish tradition, on behalf of Israel and Jews world over." [http://bit.ly/ksports5]

Chess

Things went a bit smoother for Israeli chess grandmaster Boris Gelfand. Last year, he was scheduled to compete at the London Grand Prix Chess Tournament on Kol Nidrei evening, so the game was moved up several hours. The tournament concluded in a three-way tie between Gelfand and his opponents from Azerbaijan and Bulgaria. [http://bit.ly/ksports6]

Most of us will probably never face the dilemma of deciding whether to pitch at the World Series on Yom Kippur. Our temptations are more prosaic like the one in this apocryphal tale:

Sidney telephones Rabbi Levy. "Rabbi, I know tonight's Kol Nidre, but tonight the Yanks are in the playoffs. I'm a lifelong Yankee fan. I've got to watch the Yankee game on TV."

Rabbi Levy replies, "Sidney, that's what TiVo is for."

Sidney is surprised. "You mean I can record Kol Nidre?" [http://bit.ly/ksports8]

This year, try the middle path

Midrashic Moments
Rachael Turkienicz

I had an interesting conversation with someone recently about Rosh Hashanah. They explained to me that because of a long history of family troubles and unfortunate events, they find it too painful to attend a synagogue and, therefore, this year, they decided not to celebrate Rosh Hashanah.

I listened carefully and questioned their conclusion that it was "synagogue or nothing." Somehow they had concluded that Rosh Hashanah could only happen in a formal place of ritual. It was an either/or situation, a black-or-white scenario – an idea that brought our thoughts right back to the Garden of Eden and the first Rosh Hashanah.

Rosh Hashanah, the Jewish New Year, is the day we believe God created humanity. On that same day, Adam and Eve were created and sinned by eating from the Tree of Knowledge. Since that first generation, we have wondered why eating from that tree was so bad as to warrant the resulting consequences: ultimate death and banishment from Eden.

The Zohar offers an interesting insight. It suggests that by eating from that tree, Adam and Eve introduced the concept of either/or into a world of harmony. If we think about it, this is the only tree whose name signifies this either/or approach. It is the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil. No other creation bears that distinction within its name. The other tree that's named is the Tree of Life, not the Tree of Life and Death. Only the Tree of Knowledge intimates a stark distinction between things, rather than a flow, a harmony.

By eating from this tree, Adam and Eve bring into the world the kind of philosophy that yields a statement such as, "It's my way or the highway." This approach is contrary to nature, which offers blends and waves, and waxing and waning. We have evening before night and we have dawn before daytime. Nature teaches us to blend our lives with everything that's around us. We must not live in the extremes, nor should we approach our Judaism with an "either/or" mentality.

According to this blended view, there will be times when the atheist admits there are miracles in life that we can't explain and times when the religious person admits there are questions of the Divine we can't understand.

Judaism doesn't tell us to have a definitive answer to things, but rather to form the questions that blur the answers – to create the grey zone.

My friend could have created a positive Rosh Hashanah experience in an informal spiritual setting. It didn't have to be "synagogue or nothing." At the same time, it's possible to sit in a synagogue and dream of the year to come without necessarily following the prayer and not be considered negligent.

The sages brought us this idea long ago when they stated, "Torah is like two paths, one of fire and one of snow. If you follow one path, you will die of heat. If you follow the other, you will die of cold. What should you do? Take the middle path."

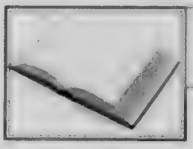
A gash in the body of Israel

Rabbi Debra Landsberg



Rabbinic Reflections

My memories tend to be impressionistic, not detailed – for instance, I recall the warm glow of my childhood and the storm of my teen years. Consistent in my memory, however, are the High Holidays, which shone with joy.

But this year, I am overcome by one memory that stands forward, vivid and frightening: I was very young, and it was Yom Kippur. I think that the news must have spread first among the congregants. When the rabbi heard, he looked ashen-faced. I say without hyperbole that to see the rabbi so afraid was the most terrible thing I had ever beheld. I must have asked what was wrong. He explained: "The countries surrounding Israel have attacked. Israel is in mortal peril. No one knows what's going to happen."

For a little girl raised in a conventional liberal Zionist home, where Israel was the scaffolding for our postwar security, this was the earth giving way.

I will never forget the following days, with elderly Jews visiting our house asking, "Rabbi, what will happen?" My father was a young American rabbi. He had experience in family disputes, congregational controversies and fighting for justice. But he had no experience looking old Jews in the eye – Jews who had lost innumerable relatives in the Shoah – and being asked: "Will the Third Temple fall?"

That phrase stayed with me, though only later did I discover its origin was not in my father's study.

In a spasm of fear days after the war's onset, then-Israeli defence minister Moshe Dayan said to prime minister Golda Meir that the Third Temple may fall. (Meir, according to the records, prevented him from sharing his assessment with the press.)

Fast-forward 40 years. A lot has changed. As a community, we're deeply divided when discussing Israel's vital interests. Any talk of the Third Temple does not refer to the human-built State of Israel (as it did for Dayan), but to a rebuilt God-sanctioned sanctuary on the Temple Mount.

But now is the 40th anniversary of that day when men took off tallit to pick up arms, when machzor and heart were in complete alignment – with mothers and daughters, sons and fathers pleading that their loved ones be inscribed in the Book of Life, knowing that the Malach Hamavet was close at hand, when the future itself seemed full of dread.

I am all too aware that the events of yesteryear have taken on a sepia hue for many who pass through the synagogue gates. But we must oppose this all-too-human desire to smooth over the trauma in our collective stories. The Yom Kippur War was a gash in the body of Israel. Nothing less.

So this year, recollect for yourself what took place. Whisper the terrible details to your children, not to cause alarm but to honour the past. Clasp the machzor and open your heart to those whose last words of prayer are written therein. Recite Yizkor for the thousands we know only as names on the casualty list from 40 years ago this day. As we pray for our future and that of the Jewish People, we should do so humbly.

Rabbi Debra Landsberg is spiritual leader of Temple Emanu-El in Toronto.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

The voice of the chazzan

From the Bimah
Rabbi Philip Scheim

The untimely passing this past summer of Cantor Moshe Schulhof, whose illustrious career began in Montreal and who had frequently delighted Canadian audiences during concert appearances, calls to mind the role of the chazzan in traditional Jewish worship, especially during this High Holiday season.

In recent years, the Toronto community lost cantors David Bagley and Louis Danto, while Montreal witnessed the end of a cantorial era with the passing of cantors Solomon and Hyman Gisser. The loss of these great chazzanim saddens me, not only because of my having known them and having been privileged to experience the stunning, inspiring quality of their renditions of our liturgy, but also because it reflects a transition in our patterns of synagogue worship that I fear may not be for the better.

It's not a well-guarded secret that the cantorate as a profession is challenged by modern times, as typified in Sholom Secunda's comedic spoof, Hazzanim oif Probe (Cantors Auditioning), in which a synagogue cantorial search chairman rejects classical cantors by saying: "Dos is nisht vos der public vilt!" ("This is not what the people want.") The sense that "this is not what the people want" has led to a widespread departure from classical cantorial tradition in our communities, towards a preference, in Orthodox congregations, for a simple ba'al tfillah, a prayer leader, and in non-Orthodox communities, to popular melodies that can be easily sung together by congregants, but have no resemblance to the chazzanut that inspired earlier generations.

There is something to be said, of course, for a service led by a competent and pleasant-voiced prayer leader who is not a professional chazzan, just as the melodies popularized by gifted composers such as the late Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach and Debbie Friedman are beautiful and captivating. Participatory services in which their tunes and other engaging melodies are sung together by all in attendance have understandably, and rightly, been embraced by communities throughout the Jewish world.

But I would hope that a place remains in our synagogues for the haunting chants of the classical chazzan. Most would agree that a "jazzed-up" Kol Nidrei recitation departing from the traditional melody would not satisfy the throngs that will fill our shuls this week. We hunger for the very same melody, chanted three times, in the classical, profoundly moving voice of the traditional chazzan. Many of the other prayers of the machzor, and of our Shabbat and Yom Tov siddur, call out for the voice of the cantor, conveying not only the power of the words, but the emotion of the Jewish heart in a way unlike even the most appealing popular melody or tune.

In commenting upon how one determines whether or not a movie succeeds in reaching its audience, director Steven Spielberg once suggested the question to be asked is "Did it make you cry?" If our traditional Jewish worship services are going to retain their hold on our communities, they must, in some way, continue to make us cry.

In other words, they must connect with our inner emotions, touch us, and elevate our spirits. In addition to uplifting sermons, and spirited congregational singing, in order to penetrate the Jewish heart, as they have done through the generations, our services require the voice of the chazzan.

U.S. president seeks approval for limited strike

He attributed that to what he called sober policies and unspecified actions by the security hierarchy, some of which are not known to the public.

Meanwhile in Washington, officials with the American-Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) reportedly said the pro-Israel group will lobby U.S. lawmakers to authorize a retaliatory strike on Syria for its alleged use of chemical weapons.

The unnamed officials told several media outlets over the weekend that the group would send activists to Capitol Hill this week to garner support for a resolution to launch a limited military strike in retaliation for the Aug. 21 attack by the Syrian government.

Barack Obama

Investigations have provided mounting evidence that Assad used chemical weapons in an attack in a Damascus suburb that killed some 1,400 people, including approximately 400 children.

Obama is working to gain support from Congress to launch the limited strike in response to the attack. Meanwhile, Assad said in an interview that he did not use chemical weapons against his citizens, CBS News reported Sunday.

"There has been no evidence that I used chemical weapons against my own people," Assad said in the interview conducted in Damascus, according to the network's news program Face the Nation.

The CBS News report came hours after the German newspaper Bild am Sonntag reported the Syrian army may have launched the attack without Assad's approval.

CNN on Saturday night began airing videos shown by the Obama administration to key members of the Senate in which victims are seen dying in the attack's aftermath.

The announcement by AIPAC – among many Jewish groups backing Obama's call to strike Syria militarily – came as Israel continues to keep a low public profile regarding Syria.

Israel, however, continues to distribute gas masks to its citizens over concerns of retaliatory chemical weapons attacks by Syria on Israel.

Also Sunday, Reuters quoted an unnamed Israeli official as saying the United States would notify Israel several hours before it launched an attack on Syria.

The news agency also reported that its TV division filmed what it believed to be an Iron Dome anti-missile battery being positioned on the periphery of Jerusalem.

Jewish groups backing Obama's call to strike Syria militarily are citing moral outrage and U.S. national security as primary considerations, but concern for Israel – however muted – also looms large in their thinking.

A lingering sensitivity over misrepresentations of the role of the pro-Israel community in the lead-up to the Iraq War in 2003 kept Jewish groups from weighing in on Syria until it was clear Obama was determined to strike. Now that same sensitivity is leading them to downplay any mention of Israel.

Officials of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, finishing up a Sept. 3 conference call with top security advisers to Obama, waited until the White House staffers were off the call before urging constituent organizations not to make their statements "Israel-centric."

Notably, Israel was not mentioned in any of the three statements that emerged immediately following the conference call, which was convened to solidify support for Obama's call for a strike. The statements – from AIPAC and the Anti-Defamation League as well as the Presidents Conference – only alluded to Israel.

"America's allies and adversaries are closely watching the outcome of this momentous vote," the AIPAC statement said. "This critical decision comes at a time when Iran is racing toward obtaining nuclear capability. Failure to approve this resolution would weaken our country's credibility to prevent the use and proliferation of unconventional weapons and thereby greatly endanger our country's security and interests and those of our regional allies."

The statements focused on the need to contain a nation that has crossed a red line by using chemical weapons against its citizens.

"Those who perpetuate such acts of wanton murder must know that they cannot do so with impunity," the Presidents Conference statement said. "Those who possess or seek weapons of mass destruction, particularly Iran and Hezbollah, must see that there is accountability."

Israel nonetheless loomed large in an off-the-record conference call between Jewish officials and two of Obama's top national security advisers. One Jewish official asked whether the United States would assist militarily should Syria attack Israel. (The answer: yes, but it's the U.S. assessment that Assad is not that reckless.)

One of the White House officials repeatedly emphasized that acting to keep Syria from using chemical weapons was a critical step to keeping Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon. The vocal support of American Jews comes as Obama ramps up efforts to win congressional support for a military strike.

Israel decries leaks in peace talks

"The delegation hopes that the ongoing direct permanent status negotiations will lead to a resolution that achieves a just and lasting peace through resolving all permanent status issues as a major step towards comprehensive Middle East Peace which will contribute to regional security and stability," the statement said.

The ministerial committee included representatives from Bahrain, Egypt, Jordan, Morocco, the Palestinian Authority, Qatar, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates, along with the Arab League's secretary general.

In related developments, a negotiator for Israel in the relaunched peace talks protested what he said are Palestinian officials' leaks to the media about the content of the talks.

Isaac Molho, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's envoy to the peace talks, in a call over the weekend to his U.S. counterpart, Martin Indyk, complained about numerous leaks by named and unnamed Palestinian officials.

Molho said the leaks "violated all the agreements" agreed to by the two sides with Kerry, Ha'aretz reported, citing an unnamed Israeli official.

At the beginning of the talks in Washington in July, both sides agreed to maintain silence on the time, place and content of the meetings, reportedly at Kerry's request.

Last week on the eve of Rosh Hashanah, in an interview with the Voice of Palestine radio, Yasser Abed Rabbo, secretary general of the Palestine Liberation Organization's executive committee, said there has been "no progress" in the talks and that it will require pressure from the United States to advance toward peace.

During interviews given over Israel's long holiday weekend for Rosh Hashanah, several other named and unnamed Palestinian officials similarly declared that the peace talks were stagnating.

Meanwhile, in Rome on Sunday, tens of thousands of people in St. Peter's Square in Vatican City converged for a peace vigil for Syria called by Pope Francis, in which he called for peace and reconciliation throughout the Middle East.

"This evening, I ask the Lord that we Christians, and our brothers and sisters of other religions, and every man and woman of goodwill, cry out forcefully: violence and war are never the way to peace!" Pope Francis, who had spent the day fasting, told the crowd Saturday night.

"May the noise of weapons cease! War always marks the failure of peace, it is always a defeat for humanity," he added. "Forgiveness, dialogue, reconciliation – these are the words of peace, in beloved Syria, in the Middle East, in all the world! Let us pray for reconciliation and peace, let us work for reconciliation and peace."

The Vatican estimated that more than 100,000 people took part in the culmination of a "day of fasting and prayer for peace" convoked by Francis on Sept. 1.

The Vatican stressed the gathering was religious, not political, but observers said it resembled a political rally at times, with participants waving Syrian flags and wearing T-shirts and holding placards with slogans such as "Hands off Syria," "Don't attack Syria" and "Obama you have no dream, you have a nightmare."

The Vatican reported that Pope Francis also tweeted the message "Pray for peace" to his nine million Twitter followers.

Netanyahu derides Iranian holiday greetings

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said he was "not impressed" by New Year's greetings supposedly tweeted by Iranian President Hassan Rouhani.

Benjamin Netanyahu

"I am not impressed by greetings coming from a regime that only last week threatened to destroy Israel," Netanyahu said Saturday night, according to Israeli media reports.

The tweet posted Sept. 4, the eve of Rosh Hashanah, said, "As the sun is about to set here in Tehran I wish all Jews, especially Iranian Jews, a blessed Rosh Hashanah."

Rouhani's office has not denied the account, @HassanRouhani, belongs to the recently elected president, and it is believed the account would not persist without his approval.

Rouhani was elected this year as a relative moderate ostensibly willing to make the nuclear program in Iran more transparent. But he has resisted calls by western states and Israel to reduce his country's uranium enrichment.

"The Iranian regime will be examined only by its actions and not by salutations," Netanyahu also said Saturday night, following the two days of Rosh Hashanah and Shabbat.

Netanyahu said the purpose of the message "is to divert attention from the fact that, even after the elections, it [Iran] continues the enrichment of uranium and the construction of a plutonium reactor meant to allow it to develop nuclear weapons that will threaten Israel and the rest of the world."

Meanwhile, Iranian Foreign Minister Javad Zarif also tweeted, "Happy Rosh Hashanah," the second tweet on his newly opened account.

In a Twitter exchange, Christine Pelosi challenged Zarif over Iranian Holocaust denial. She is the daughter of Nancy Pelosi, the ranking Democrat in the U.S. House of Representatives, whose husband is Jewish.

"Thanks," Christine Pelosi tweeted. "The New Year would be even sweeter if you would end Iran's Holocaust denial, sir."

Zarif replied, "Iran never denied it. The man who was perceived to be denying it is now gone. Happy New Year."

Arabs arrested after throwing rocks at Jews visiting Temple Mount

JTA

JERUSALEM — At least seven Arab worshipers on the Temple Mount were arrested following clashes that included throwing rocks at Jewish visitors to the holy site.

Israeli police made the arrests on the morning of Sept. 4 following reports of masked men throwing rocks at Jews visiting the site in advance of Rosh Hashanah.

Consequently, police prevented several buses of Arab worshipers from making their way to the Temple Mount, believing they intended to incite violence, according to reports.

The violence came a day after the arrest of Islamic Movement leader Sheikh Raed Salah, who had called on Muslims to prevent the "dangerous mass invasion into Al-Aqsa" with their bodies.

The Al-Aqsa Mosque is situated on the Temple Mount in the place where Jews believe the holy of holies of the First and Second Temples was located.

On a visit to the Temple Mount on the morning of Sept. 4, Israel's Housing and Construction Minister Uri Ariel said, "The Temple Mount is the holiest place for the Jewish people and must be open for prayer at every hour to every Jew."

Ariel, of the Jewish Home party, said he "plans to continue to go up [to the Mount] and strengthen the State of Israel's sovereignty in the site."

Leonard Israel Halprin ז"ל
Feb. 12, 1925 – July 23, 2013

Len passed away peacefully at the Louis Brier Home in Vancouver with family at his side. He is survived by four of his children. Rokie Bernstein (Bob), Josh (Barb), David, and Megan, his five grandchildren: Miel (Claus), Sarah (Greg), Mike, Alexandra, and Aaron, two great grandchildren: (Sage and Jade) and his brother Herb (Susan), sister in law Sandra, and many cousins, nieces and nephews. Len was predeceased by his son Irving (Chuckie), Miriam (Finkelstein) his beloved wife of more than 50 years, and his brother Tom. Len had a long and full life. Although he lived in Vancouver for the last 32 years of his life, first and foremost he was a North End guy – one of the Matheson Ave boys, a member of the St. John's Tech group. Len served in the Air Force briefly. Both in Winnipeg and in Vancouver, he was a well-respected children's wear buyer. Len will be remembered best however for being a true gentleman and a gentle man. He was a lifelong volunteer, always active in the community. Along with Miriam and six or seven other couples, they raised the money to build the River Heights Community Center and then volunteered there for many years. Len was still driving the "old folks" to lunch at the JCC in Vancouver when he was 80. Len was the nicest person you would ever want to meet - a true mensch. He will be remembered for his great smile, quiet sense of humour and love of family. Len was a realist – his favourite saying "it is what it is." Poppy (as he was known to many) was sweet, kind, and generous. He was the guy people called when they were troubled or in trouble. Special thanks go to Mothe and Hajie for their loving care of Dad. Funeral services and Interment were in Winnipeg. Donations may be made to the Leonard Halprin Fund at the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba

YAHRZEIT

In loving memory of

Harry and Ida Weisleder ז"ל

Dad, always a song in your heart.
Mom, a kind, caring and generous soul.
You lived for us and will be with us forever.

Love, your Children and Grandchildren

Saving tax shouldn't be reason to donate, says Bronfman

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Philanthropy shouldn't only be about making donations, Charles Bronfman says. If you want to give to charities in a significant way, do so with conviction and manage your giving like a business, he advised.

Bronfman, chair of Andrea & Charles Bronfman Philanthropies Inc., which annually provides multimillion-dollar support to causes in the United States, Canada and Israel, made a rare public appearance in his native Montreal on Sept. 3. He was honoured as Man of the Year by the Jewish Community Foundation of Montreal (JCF) at its 42nd annual general meeting.

"If you're just giving money because some tax accountant says it's a good idea, you're wasting your time," Bronfman said in conversation with Marvin Corber, a longtime friend and, incidentally, a chartered accountant.

"Do something more noble; help your community, and that can be defined as your street, your country, the world – and it can be on a small or large basis," Bronfman said.

Corber noted that Bronfman and his Peruvian-born wife, Rita Salomon, whom he married a year ago, are spending more time in Montreal, where she has lived for many years. The couple divide their time between New York, where he moved in 1996, Palm Beach, Fla., Israel and here.

Bronfman, co-author of two books on philanthropy, also advised running one's charitable giving as a business by setting goals and measuring results.

And, he added, "self-audit. If you go to someone outside, they are going to want to come back, to be rehired. They're not going to say you did something terrible."

Bronfman, who retired from a 50-year career with The Seagram Co. Ltd., wrote with Jeffrey Solomon The Art of Giving: Where the Soul Meets a Business Plan in 2010 and The Art of Doing Good, published last year.

While the first addressed the concerns of major-league donors, the latter profiles 18 individuals who started with little or nothing, and in some instances, had known personal tragedy and created thriving programs around the world helping others. Bronfman calls them "social entrepreneurs."

Bronfman, the co-founder of Birthright Israel, also stressed the necessity of being passionate about whatever cause one takes on.

Andrea & Charles Bronfman Philanthropies, which he and his late wife founded in 1985, will wind down in 2016. Bronfman promised he "will not fade away," but will continue to try to persuade donors and recipients to take philanthropy "very seriously."

The programs started by his foundation were designed to eventually be able to stand on their own two feet, he said.

"I will not take on any new projects," he added. "Sorry about that, folks."

Regarding philanthropy as serious business doesn't mean you can't have fun, he said. On the contrary, Bronfman believes in doing what you love.

"If you're going to do this kind of work, whether professionally or as a volunteer, do your investigation, decide what turns you on, enjoy it to the fullest. That doesn't mean you don't have to fight, but have a lot of fun."

Bronfman commented that how much money the JCF manages today "blew my mind."

Treasurer Michael Etinson reported that, as of March 31, the end of its fiscal year, JCF's assets were $344 million, up from $286 million the year before. That was achieved in part through contributions of over $38 million.

A record $29 million was distributed to charities over the year.

Short men shop at Brown's 'because it fits'

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Lou Brown isn't a big guy to start with – five-foot-six at his peak, and now, with the passage of time, closer to five-foot-four.

At that height, it would seem he'd be a natural to come up with a concept in men's retailing to satisfy the needs of guys just like him – a store that caters to the, how shall we put this in the politically correct times in which we live, the vertically challenged.

Brown, 84, predates political correctness by a generation or two, so the name of his store is Brown's, A Short Man's World. Alternatively, it's called Shortman Brown's, while the store's promotional material proclaims: "Nobody's bigger in short."

Brown's definition of short is somewhat flexible. If you're five-foot-eight or under, the store is for you.

As far as men's apparel stores go, Brown's has it all: suits, slacks, ties, shirts, belts, shoes – sizes range from 5-1/2 to eight – and outerwear. There are two locations, one on Avenue Road, not too far from Wilson Avenue, the other at 545 Queen St. W.

Business is good despite the economic downturn of recent years. "We do six figures in sales per store," Brown said.

The bulk of the store's designer suits range in price from $698 to $998, though some higher-end items are available.

What makes the store unique is that all the apparel is specifically tailored for short men. You can't just hem pants for shorter people or shorten sleeves. The pockets won't be right, the pant knee will be too low, the garment won't look good, he said.

Same with jackets and outerwear. "You can come in here at five-foot-five and be fitted properly," he said.

Clearly there's a market for the kind of "destination store" Brown and his late father, Willy, created. People come from across the city and even from outside the country for the store's clothing.

Brown's is a typical immigrant success story.

The store, like Lou, started out 84 years ago, but back then it had not carved out a niche in the short men's market.

His dad, an immigrant from Poland, "couldn't get a job because he was Jewish. He finally got a job at a pant factory, but he didn't know the first thing about tailoring," Brown said.

The Jewish owner of the business agreed to train him if he'd work for nothing. After two weeks as a pocket-maker, Willy approached the boss and asked for $5 a week. The boss turned him down, so he quit and went to work for a competitor at $8 a week.

"After a few months, he decided he won't get anywhere as a pant-maker. So he opened his own second-hand clothes store on Queen," the same address as the current store, Brown said.

At the time, Queen Street was full of Jewish-owned businesses. His three uncles also had clothing stores on the avenue.

Lou Brown

Called Brown's, the shop was all of 450 square feet. The family lived above the store.

Brown attended Ryerson Public School and then Harbord Collegiate, but he dropped out at 16.

"I wasn't a scholar, but I had a knack for talking and I joined my dad in the second-hand store," he said.

It was a rather unusual circumstance that prompted him to suggest that the store move from second-hand clothes to new ones. As Brown tells it, "working in a second-hand store, the girls wouldn't date you. I told dad, 'I'm having a problem.'"

His father agreed to expand the business. It went from all second-hand apparel to half new, half previously worn.

At the time, his dad would buy suits from Baldwin Street pedlars for $5. He'd clean them, patch them up and put them for sale for $8. "It was a good profit in those days."

As time went by, business improved. By the 1950s, the store had expanded into four locations, including New Toronto and an outlet at Lawrence Plaza.

But for Lou, things were getting a little stale. "After awhile, it wasn't exciting any more. My father was building houses and I wasn't enjoying it anymore. It was just a job."

A new idea sprang Brown out of his funk. A lot of men of European stock would come in to buy. Many were short.

"I saw the need… Shorter men would come in, and we didn't have enough stock [to fit them]."

By then, the family had moved out of the upstairs rooms on Queen Street, so he suggested to his dad they call it "the loft" and stock it with clothing appropriate for shorter people.

To make sure they had the right merchandise, Brown approached manufacturers with whom the family had a good relationship, and had them design suits and shirts appropriate for the new client base. That meant sleeves and pockets were cut to look good on shorter customers.

It was in the 1970s, and Shortman Brown's was created.

People loved it, Brown recalled. "This lawyer comes in with his wife, a short guy. He'd heard about us. She said he always was in a hurry, and while I was talking to his wife, he comes up and says, 'I feel like I'm in a candy store.' That gave me a lot of encouragement."

After a few years, the store was selling more short apparel than regular. The downstairs at Queen shifted over to short merchandise and accessories were added. There's even a line of clothing for the extra short – guys around five-foot-three.

As the store's radio ad's signature line tells it, you'd buy at Browns, "because it fits."

At one point, the Avenue Road store carried both men's and women's clothing, but today, the upstairs has been turned over to clothing for "stout men" as well as off-season wear.

"We're strictly 100 per cent a destination store. People come from all over the country," said Brown.

"We have tailors in both stores, and if a guy comes in from out of town and he's going back, we'll fix him up right away.

"We only have two things to sell you, fit and service, nothing else. We give honest value."

As for his father, Willy worked in the business until age 93, when he was killed in an auto accident. Lou continues to come into the store six days a week, but he admits he keeps bankers' hours – in at the crack of 11, out at 3. His two sons, Robbie and Jeffrey, run the stores, but he likes to come in and kibbitz with the customers.

"I love it," he said. "It's a hobby. It has nothing to do with business anymore. It's a hobby."

Jewish all along: Genie Milgrom's journey through time

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

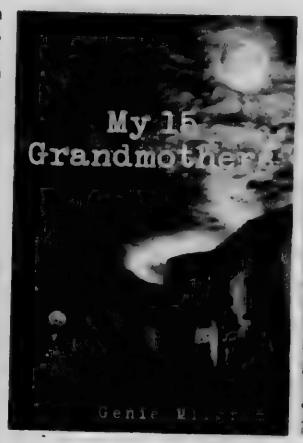
My 15 Grandmothers
Genie Milgrom
Createspace

Genie Milgrom, the author of My 15 Grandmothers, was one of numerous captivating speakers at the five-day International Conference on Jewish Genealogy last month in Boston.

Although she was born into a Roman Catholic family of Spanish origin in Havana, Cuba, Milgrom felt an affinity for Judaism from a young age. She was five years old when her wealthy family fled the Cuban Revolution and relocated to Miami, Fla., where she grew up.

She was 32 when she converted to Judaism, a burdensome mission that had involved years of study and eventual submission to a beit din and, of course, submersion in a mikvah. Only afterward did she begin to explore her outwardly Catholic family tree, and discover to her amazement that she was already halachically Jewish (according to Jewish law) all along.

At first all she had were clues handed down to her from both of her maternal grandparents. They had been second cousins whose ancestors were from a tiny village in Western Spain named Fermoselle, located on the Duero River between Spain and Portugal.



Milgrom's grandmother had left her a tattered white box inside of which she found a small piece of antique jewelry – an old Hamsa [the hand of God] – and a small gold earring adorned with a tiny Star of David. Initially she didn't appreciate the significance of these two very Jewish symbols, especially after family members told her the jewelry was probably given to her grandmother by a passing Gypsy.

Later she would be shown a very old piece of jewelry belonging to someone from another family from the town. Ostensibly, it was a simple gold ball on a chain. When you squeezed the two sides gently and pulled, the ball opened up into a chain of tiny Stars of David.

On several occasions Milgrom had asked her grandfather about the family's ancestry, but he always evaded the subject. After he died she found that he had sketched out a family tree and scrawled some history on a few sheets of old crumbling paper.

"He went back farther than I could imagine," she writes in her gripping and easily readable memoir. "Not only had he made a tree, he had also written a short history and some personality profiles. The tree went back to the early 1800s."

Hearing that a well-established professional Sephardic genealogist was going to her family's village of Fermoselle, she hired him to research her family tree. She instructed him to concentrate on "the maternal lineage, grandmother after grandmother, and document each step with copies of birth, baptism, marriage and death certificates, when possible."

Soon Milgrom was in possession of copies of documents that neatly traced her maternal Jewish ancestry, grandmother by grandmother, at least 15 generations back to the 1400s. As had quickly become clear, her family had been Bnai Anusim – "Children of the Forced" – Jews who had been forced to convert to Catholicism under dire threat of death.

The research showed that many of her cousins had intermarried, and many had become priests, both common patterns in "Converso" families. Many Bnai Anusim liked to have a priest in every generation "to make absolutely certain that the marriages that were taking place in the churches would be done according to the laws of Moses and Israel" while secretly omitting something from the Catholic rite so as to invalidate it, Milgrom writes.

Strangely, none of Milgrom's ancestors, and only two residents of Fermoselle, were named in the region's extensive Inquisition papers held in a Madrid archives. Most of her ancestors, it turned out, had escaped to Portugal, where they turned up in archives there.

Portuguese archives have digitalized many documents related to the Inquisition and posted them to the Internet. The National Archives of Torre do Tombo, for example, has documents dating back to the ninth century, including Inquisition documentation of every person sentenced or tried in the Inquisition tribunals of Lisbon, Poreto, Coimbra and Evora, Milgrom writes.

"These long documents usually include the full genealogy of the person that was judged."

During her two visits to Fermoselle, she uncovered some of the town's Jewish secrets, including the locations of former synagogues, mikvahs, Jewish homes and a system of interconnecting underground tunnels. Milgrom wrote her book because she wanted to tell her ancestors' story and "to be the voice that my ancestors never had. Most of all, I just want others who wish to find their Jewish roots to know that this quest is possible. Given the resources available in Spain and Portugal today, it can be done."

My 15 Grandmothers is available online from Amazon. Milgrom's website is geniemilgrom.com

Seven years ago Leah Hammer discovered her long-dead grandfather, Joseph J. Goodman, had in 1919 published a book of Yiddish writings, Gezamelte Shriften, and then discovered a copy in the National Yiddish Book Center in Amherst, Mass. The Yiddish volume was republished in a new bilingual edition, translated by Hannah Berliner Fischthal and edited by another of Goodman's granddaughters, Harriet Goodman Hoffman.

Included are many short poems on myriad subjects, stories such as Yankl Becomes A Canadian, and short essays that describe Goodman's experiences in various Canadian Jewish farming communities on the Prairies and in Calgary, Edmonton, Lethbridge, Medicine Hat and other western cities and towns.

"In the not-too-distant past, Edmonton was regarded as the capital of the North Pole," he writes. "If I would have needed to get there 30 years ago, I would have said goodbye to all my dear friends and given my wife a conditional divorce. If, by some miracle, I would have returned, I would have immediately gone to the synagogue to thank God for delivering me from great danger, as befits a person who comes from a place very far away.

"At this date, I am spared the entire tumult. I only needed to pack up my valise and get into a CPR sleeping car. The black porter woke me up the next morning in Edmonton. It is true that Edmonton has no past; it has, however, an extraordinarily splendid future."

ITZHAK PERLMAN TO TACKLE TCHAIKOVSKY CONCERTO IN TORONTO

Legendary Israeli-American violinist Itzhak Perlman will be a beloved guest of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra later this month when he comes here to play Tchaikovsky's much-admired Violin Concerto. The program also includes a fascinating but unfinished clarinet concerto that Benjamin Britten began composing for Benny Goodman during World War II. The final arrangement by Colin Matthews will be conducted by Peter Oundjian and features principal clarinet Joaquin Valdepenas.

Roy Thomson Hall, Sept. 25 and 26. Pre-concert chat in the lobby on Sept. 25, 7:15 p.m. www.tso.ca, 416-593-4828.

Chai Tea: The Toronto Jewish Film Festival presents a screening of When Comedy Went to School, a documentary portrait of that generation of American comics who got their start in the Catskill "Borscht Belt." Jerry Lewis, Sid Caesar, Jackie Mason, Mort Sahl, Jerry Stiller and many others share terrific stories and jokes.

The 77-minute film, by Meviut Akkaya, Ron Frank and Lawrence Richards, also features plenty of clips from various comedy films and sketches. Chai Tea, City Playhouse Theatre, 1000 New Westminster Dr., Vaughan. Sunday, Oct. 6, tea 4 p.m., film 5 p.m. $15 in advance or at the door. www.tjff.com, 416-324-9121.

Jedwabne Massacre: The film Aftermath (Poklosie) is based on one of the most controversial wartime episodes in Polish history: the Jedwabne massacre of Jews by their Polish neighbours. Directed by Wladyslaw Pasikowski, the film was based on a 1942 tragedy in which hundreds of Jews were burned alive in a barn, an event long blamed on Nazi Germany.

"I wanted to tell a story that would interest a broad number of Poles because it is one of the most painful parts of our country's history," Pasikowski said recently. "We already have a huge number of films on the horrors committed by the Soviets and the Germans, and it's time to say what bad things we did ourselves."

The film, based on the book Neighbours by U.S. historian Jan Tomasz Gross, was to be shown this week at Library & Archives Canada in Ottawa, with remarks by Prof. Jan Grabowski.

Capsule Review: Robert Wise's 1951 film noir, The House on Telegraph Hill, starring Richard Basehart and Valentina Cortese, offers an early cinematic view of a German concentration camp. A recent addition to Netflix, where it will reach a new generation of viewers, the film opens in Belsen where it depicts a group of zombie-like inmates, dressed in rags but not particularly drawn or emaciated, engaging in a mindless food squabble.

The action soon moves to San Francisco several years later, where concentration camp inmate Viktoria Kowalska arrives at the gloomy mansion that is the key locale of the drama. Having taken over the identity of her dead concentration-camp friend Karin, Viktoria comes to reclaim Karin's young son, who had been in the care of an elderly aunt, since deceased; the boy now has a guardian. All of Aunt Sophie's significant wealth will accrue to the child upon adulthood; Viktoria cements her position by marrying the guardian.

Immersed in her false new life, Viktoria discovers that her new husband is even more deeply immersed in deceit: he is secretly trying to kill her and the child in order to keep the fortune for himself and his secret mistress, Margaret the housekeeper. Interesting that the film ignores the depravity of the Germans in order to focus on the evil that lurks within the hearts of ordinary, supposedly decent folks.

In order to redeem her soul and save her life, Viktoria must come clean and tell someone the truth about her deception: her hero is a U.S. army officer who had helped her in a displaced persons camp. Is Viktoria's psychological burden a sort of survivor guilt, transmogrified into a gothic noir tale set over San Francisco's scenic and beautifully photographed Telegraph Hill?

In retrospect, the concentration camp scenes seem tame and naïve, and it seems ridiculous that there are apparently no lingering after effects whatsoever from Viktoria's years in a Nazi hell. (In keeping with a longstanding Hollywood taboo, Viktoria is depicted as Polish, not Jewish.) In addition to its short and noteworthy early treatment of the concentration camp setting, The House on Telegraph Hill is a competent but not outstanding curiosity, rated by Leonard Maltin at 2-1/2 stars.

Itzhak Perlman plays Roy Thomson Hall Sept 25 and 26.

No holds barred when comedian speaks his mind

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Andy Kindler may be known for his criticism of the comedy industry, but he doesn't really think it's all bad.

He admits there are many very talented comedians, including Hannibal Buress, John Mulaney and Maria Bamford, all of whom will be performing with Kindler at the Just for Laughs Festival in Toronto. But there are lots of really bad comedians out there as well.

The American comedian is probably best recognized for his recurring role as Andy in Everybody Loves Raymond, as well as his annual State of the Industry address at the Just for Laughs Festival, in which he roasts comedy stars and the industry itself. He drew controversy this year after accusing radio personality and comedian Adam Carolla of bigotry and racism.

Despite the controversy, he stands by his comments, admitting that people might have misunderstood his intention.

The crux of his argument, he said, is that so many comedians these days use racial stereotypes to be funny, but if it's not a joke, then it's just bigotry and racism, and Kindler wants them to know that.

Despite his being known for slamming his fellow comedians, Kindler stressed that he's not a mean guy. In fact, he said he hates personal confrontation, and when he meets people face-to-face, he's almost too nice, saving his anger for the stage.

The New York City native said that, as a kid, he took comedy for granted. "I always thought everyone was funny," he said, adding that his father was his comedy hero, and that his early standup often involved impressions of his mother.

Kindler originally thought he would be a musician. It wasn't until he was 28 that he "stumbled" into the comedy industry, after doing impressions at a company picnic.

That's when he started to perform with his friend as a team called Andy and Bill.

"There's nothing more frightening than standup," he said. "Having someone else there is good because you can blame them when something doesn't go right – and you can commiserate together."

He said that ever since he began his career, his Judaism has often been a source of material. Stereotypically, he added, Jews can be annoyed and disgusted, which works very well for comedy.

Andy Kindler will be performing at this year's Just for Laughs Festival in Toronto.

"I'm not a practising Jew because I've got it down," he said, a joke that's part of his current material.

He speaks the same way he performs – in a stream of consciousness, often commenting on his jokes and then commenting on those comments. He described his standup as about two-thirds scripted and one-third improvised.

"I didn't realize until a few years ago I had ADD. I always thought I just couldn't concentrate," he said, explaining his style. "My mind does go blank every 10 seconds on stage."

Despite his famous, or perhaps infamous, social commentary, he said he'd like to branch out a bit more to cover politics, adding he's sick of the U.S. political system, where people "use racism to get elected.

"The fact that I'm calling it racism ruffles feathers," he said. "I don't want to be known as the guy who is fighting for truth and justice, but... I want to turn over that rock and expose it for what it is."

And that's what he'll continue to do, both in his standup and online, no matter who he annoys.

Kindler said he's looking forward to visiting Toronto for the Just for Laughs festival, despite Toronto's lack of good smoked meat and bagels – compared to Montreal, anyway.

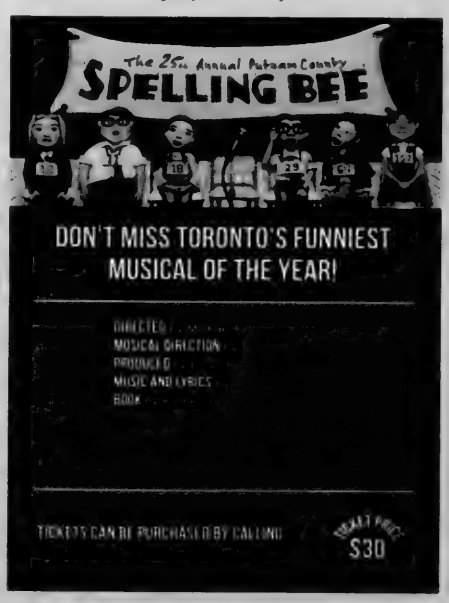
He's scheduled to perform three shows at the Toronto festival on Sept. 24, 25 and 26.

New theatre season celebrates Jewish culture

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

A play based on a real-life concentration camp liberation story and the premiere of David Ives's New Jerusalem, are among the highlights of the upcoming Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company (HGJTC) season.

The theatre company, created by co-artistic directors David Eisner and Avery Saltzman, was established to celebrate, illuminate and share Jewish culture.



The company's seventh season offers a mixed bag of shows, all taking place at the Toronto Centre for the Arts. The season includes a one-man show and a concert celebrating Jewish composers.

"We are so thrilled to be at the Toronto Centre of the Arts," Saltzman says. "The smaller space is so conducive to what we are doing and also the majority of our audience is there."

...And Stockings for the Ladies opens the company's new season and will run from Oct. 8 to 20.

Written by Attila Clemann and directed by Zach Fraser, the play explores a little-known chapter in the role of the Royal Canadian Air Force at Bergen Belsen Concentration Camp post liberation.

...And Stockings for the Ladies is about one man's need to work outside the rules to create compassionate change. "Brendan McMurtry-Howlett, the young performer in it, plays over 20 characters," Saltzman says. "It is a tour-de-force performance and was a big success at The Fringe. I think our audiences will really love it."

On stage from March 15 to April 13, 2014, is a riveting courtroom drama called New Jerusalem – The Interrogation of Baruch de Spinoza at Talmud Torah Congregation: Amsterdam, July 27, 1656.

The play's Canadian premiere is directed by Mitchell Cushman. The play re-enacts events in the life of Baruch de Spinoza, one of the greatest philosophers in history. This David Ives' off-Broadway hit challenges the traditional, political and religious thinking of the time. "This man was not a conventional thinker," Saltzman says of the play's protagonist. "He thought more of the spiritual aspect that we feel now ... that we are all God and integrated into one. To have these thoughts in 1656, he was considered a heretic."

Other plays include There's No Business Like Irving Berlin, directed by Saltzman himself, which graces the stage for one night only on Nov 3. Starring greats from the Canadian musical theatre scene including Sterling Jarvis, Sheila McCarthy, Arlene Duncan and Camilla Scott, the show celebrates one of the 20th century's best Jewish composers and lyricists.

From May 10 to June 1, 2014, HGJTC and Angelwalk Theatre will co-produce the Canadian premiere of a new off-Broadway musical called Stars of David: Prominent Jews Talk About Being Jewish. Based on Abigail Pogrebin's bestseller, it is directed by Saltzman under the musical direction of Mark Camilleri.

Stars of David is a snapshot of Jewish identity told through interviews with some of America's most recognizable public figures, including Gloria Steinem, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Joan Rivers and Aaron Sorkin. It features music from Broadway's finest composer/lyricists including Marvin Hamlish and Duncan Sheik.

HGJTC is also offering two add-ons to their regular season. Direct from Israel, An Israeli Love Story will be performed four times from Feb 13 to 16, including a special matinee performed in Hebrew. This innocent love story takes place in 1942 and tells the tale of a chance meeting between a vivacious, young girl named Margalit, and Ami, an idealistic kibbutz pioneer and soldier in the Palmach, which was the unofficial army of pre-state Israel.

Also on offer is a fundraiser for the theatre company to be held on Sept. 30, Funny Girl In Concert, starring Gabi Epstein along with the best of Canada's musical theatre talent. "It is so expensive to produce a show like Funny Girl," Saltzman says.

"For a small not-for-profit, it is impossible to do. That's why we do it in concert with a 25-piece orchestra for one night only, so the community can see a really iconic musical, including dialogue, done in concert format with full orchestration."

Singer-songwriter wins big music prize

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

For a young singer-songwriter, the chance to work with accomplished Canadian bands like Triumph and the Tragically Hip would be a dream.

For Taylor Kurta, it became a reality after she won the RBC Emerging Artist Music Mentorship Prize. In addition to the mentorship sessions with members of the award-winning bands, she won the opportunity to perform in Canada's Walk of Fame Festival this month, as well as $25,000.

"I freaked out. I didn't think it was real at first," she said. "You don't [think] things like that happen to you. When they do it's too much to comprehend."

The 20-year-old Thornhill native said she applied in March, and assumed she wouldn't win, so she stopped herself from thinking about it so as not to get her hopes up. She said she had completely forgotten about the competition until she got the call in June.

"Obviously, RBC Foundation has changed my whole entire life," she said.

She went into the famous Metalworks studio on Aug. 26, where she worked with Gil Moore and Rik Emmett, members of Triumph.

"I'm used to working in a basement studio so being in a real studio was crazy. Everything is so nice and they gave me Fiji water and everything," Kurta said. "Having them listen to my songs and catering to me, it was a weird feeling. I'm not used to it."

She knew that many acclaimed artists have recorded or mixed their tracks at Metalworks studio, including Guns N' Roses, Sam Roberts, and most recently, hiphop superstar Drake.

She said it was a "crazy" feeling to see all of the studio equipment, and to work with people "who knew what they were talking about and who gave me amazing advice."

Some of the advice included slowing down one of her songs to bring the audience into the music.

"Getting advice from Canadian legends like that was really surreal, and I feel so fortunate," she said.

In total, she spent 20 hours in the studio. She'll get another 10 hours of expert advice when she heads to another studio with Gord Sinclair from the Tragically Hip. She hopes to complete the 30 hours with a new extended play to her name, an album with three or four professionally recorded songs.

Kurta's first purchase with the prize money was a new guitar – an electric acoustic guitar, which she said will drastically change and improve her live sound.

It's a Martin guitar – the same company as the one that made her first ever guitar, which she got when she was 14.

"One day I saw my friend playing guitar and I thought, 'I wonder if I can do that.' So I sat for two weeks, playing four hours a night," she said.

By singing over the music, she was able to develop a certain vocal style, which she said is quite different from many other singer-songwriters.

Samples of her songs are at taylorkurta.com.

The rest of the prize money will go towards a degree in music therapy – something that Kurta sees herself doing in her future, as well as performing. She plans to enrol for that program at Wilfred Laurier University starting September 2014, although she's happy to move it if her performing career takes off.

She chose Laurier because of its proximity to Toronto, so she can continue to perform in the city while she studies.

She said that music therapy is so important to her because of its ability to heal people.

"I feel like everyone in this world has this purpose," she said. "If I was given a gift, it's my duty to share that with other people. If I can heal other people with music, then why not?"

Jew me down

Married With Kids
Lauren Kramer

The comments came out of nowhere, which is why they took us by surprise.

Over the four years we'd known him, our friend, Steve, was well aware we were Jewish. But all of a sudden, this summer, anti-Semitic jokes began spilling into his conversation in the most random ways.

"Everyone knows Jews make all the money," he deadpanned during a golf game. Was he joking or serious? The Jewish golfers around him wondered. No one said a word, but we talked it over later. Why would he say something like that? It had felt like a slap in the face, a bombshell dropped on an otherwise beautiful day out with friends.

We let it go.

But a few weeks later, there were more comments. And later, even more.

I was angry at our friend, but mostly disappointed. Did he not realize from the stunned silence how offensive he was being? Was he testing the boundaries of humour with his Jewish friends, trying to poke fun, or intentionally voicing anti-Semitic sentiments? My husband and I talked it over late at night and decided it had to be a pathetic attempt at humour that was, at best, inappropriate.

After another Jew-comment over dinner, I tried to address the unfunny jokes anecdotally.

"Can you believe it? A North Vancouver city councillor recently announced at a council meeting that he would not be 'Jewed down' on taxes?" I told our group of friends.

Last May, Rod Clark had said the city was "getting Jewed down completely" on the taxes it was owed. When his political blunder was addressed seconds later at the same meeting, the stubborn man refused to retract his comment, believing the phrase was just an ordinary, meaningless part of the lexicon.

It wasn't until it made the headlines that he could be convinced otherwise and changed tack, swapping indignation for repentance.

"A lot of people don't consider the racial stereotypes behind comments like this," I declared, making sure Steve was listening carefully.

The conversation moved on. But the anti-Semitic cracks Steve had voiced still weighed heavily on my mind. I wrestled with the prospect of a direct confrontation and decided it was the only way to completely clear the air.

I knocked on his door and with a grave expression and little preamble, started my shpiel. "Those Jew jokes you've been making – they're really not funny," I told him. "They hit a nerve and make me very uncomfortable. Please, no more."

Steve apologized for his poor taste in humour, and we moved on. The Jew jokes stopped completely and the friendship continued with barely a hiccup.

Except that comments like the ones he uttered can never be completely eradicated. They get stored somewhere deep in our individual psyche, and when they're uttered again, they emerge, their arrows sharper and more penetrative than ever.

I like to think that if there's a next time – a different joker, and different circumstances – there will be no "letting go" or late-night pondering of true meaning.

Next time, I shall say, unequivocally, "That was totally inappropriate."

Try lunch for dinner

Daphna Rabinovitch
Special to the CJN

I absolutely adore Indian summer. Somehow, the still warm days and the still abundant produce that's evident at the grocery store mean I don't have to rush headlong into autumn but can still savour the sweet smells of fresh tomatoes, herbs and vegetables, and at least pretend that although schedules are fast becoming furious, I can make delicious, garden fresh dinners.

Sandwiches are the ideal vehicle for the late summer richness of field tomatoes, emerald zucchini and succulent sweet peppers. Sandwiches are also relatively quick, require little preparation and can even be tucked into a napkin and toted along as families drive to newly started soccer matches and the like. I've included different bread ideas in each recipe but, of course, choose the bread your family prefers – there's no shortage of available options.

STEAK SANDWICH WITH CARMELIZED ONIONS AND CHIMICHURRI SAUCE

Chimichurri, an Argentine condiment, usually has chilies, or at least hot pepper flakes, added to it, for some fire. Since I've added a peppery arugula to this sandwich, I've omitted the customary heat in the sauce. Feel free to add a pinch if your family likes it hot.

Caramelized Onions:
3 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
5 large onions, stemmed and sliced
1 tbsp. packed light brown sugar
Chimichurri Sauce:
1 cup packed fresh parsley leaves
1 cup packed fresh coriander leaves
1 tbsp. fresh oregano leaves
4 large cloves garlic, peeled
2 tbsp. red wine vinegar
1/3 cup extra virgin olive oil salt and pepper, to taste
Steak:
1 lb. grilling steak
1 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
pinch each salt and pepper
4 sandwich rolls
2 cups fresh arugula leaves

Heat the oil in a large skillet set over medium heat. Add the onions and sugar; cook, stirring occasionally, for 25 to 30 minutes or until the onions are very soft and caramelized. Set aside.

Meanwhile, make the chimichurri sauce. Place the parsley, coriander, oregano, garlic and vinegar in the bowl of a food processor fitted with the metal "S" blade. Pulse until finely chopped. With the machine running, pour the olive oil through the feed tube, for about 1 minute. Transfer to a serving bowl. Season to taste with salt and pepper.

Brush the steak (or steaks) with the oil. Season lightly with salt and pepper. Grill on a preheated grill set over medium-high heat, turning once, for 8 to 10 minutes or until medium-rare. Transfer to a plate; tent with foil for 5 minutes. Cutting against the grain, slice the steak into thin slices.

Cut each sandwich roll in half without cutting all the way through. Line each bun with one-quarter of the arugula. Top with 1/4 of the caramelized onions. Evenly divide the meat on top. Slather with chimichurri sauce. Serve immediately. Makes 4 servings.

ITALIAN GRILLED CHEESE

Nothing could be simpler than this flash-in-a-pan sandwich. The smokiness of the Mozzarella elevates this old favourite to a distinctly new level. The garlic-infused oil perfumes the sandwich, complementing the basil as well as the tomatoes.

2 cloves garlic, minced
1/4 tsp. salt
3 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
8 slices challah bread
4 oz. smoked or plain Mozzarella, sliced
3 oz. Fontina, thinly sliced
1 large ripe tomato, cut into 8 slices
1/3 cup fresh basil leaves

In small bowl, mash the garlic and salt together using the back of a spoon, until it is paste-like. Stir in the olive oil. Let stand for 5 minutes.

Place 4 of the challah slices on a work surface. Divide the Mozzarella evenly among the 4 slices. Top each with 2 tomato slices and at least two basil leaves. Divide the Fontina evenly among the sandwiches. Top with remaining challah slices. Brush half of the olive oil mixture over the top bread slice.

Heat a large non-stick skillet over medium-high heat. Invert the sandwiches into the skillet so that the oil brushed side meets the heat. Cook for about 5 minutes or until the underside is golden. Brush the tops of each sandwich with the remaining oil mixture. Carefully flip each sandwich over. Cook for 3 to 5 minutes or until the underside is golden and the cheese has melted. Serve immediately. Makes 4 servings.

CURRIED CHICKEN SANDWICH WITH GUACAMOLE TOMATO MAYONNAISE

Both the grilled chicken breasts and the guacamole mayonnaise can be made up to 4 hours ahead and kept covered in the refrigerator, making this an easy to put together fuss-free sandwich. Be sure to bring both the chicken and the mayonnaise to room temperature for best results.

2 boneless skinless chicken breasts
2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
1/2 tsp. curry powder
1/2 tsp. each cayenne, salt and pepper
Guacamole Mayonnaise:
2 small ripe avocados
1/4 cup low fat mayonnaise
1/4 cup finely chopped tomatoes
1/4 cup finely chopped red onion
2 tbsp. finely chopped fresh coriander
1 tbsp. freshly squeezed lime juice
1/4 tsp. each salt and pepper
2 plain or whole grain large pitas
4 lettuce leaves

In a small bowl, mash the avocado until creamy but still a bit chunky. Stir in the mayonnaise, tomatoes, red onion, coriander, lime juice, salt and pepper; set aside.

Place the chicken breasts on a clean cutting board. Cut in half as if to butterfly, but cut all the way through to make two thin pieces.

In a separate bowl, stir together the oil, curry powder, cayenne, salt and pepper. Brush the oil mixture over one side of the chicken breasts. Place the grilled chicken breasts on a preheated grill, oiled side down, over medium-high heat. Grill for 5 minutes. Brush the remaining oil mixture over the top side. Flip the chicken; grill for about 5 more minutes or until no longer pink inside.

Cut each pita in half and open up slightly. Line one side with a lettuce leaf. Place one chicken breast beside the lettuce. Divide the guacamole mayonnaise evenly between the pita halves, spreading it beside the chicken. Serve immediately. Makes 4 servings.

GRILLED VEGETABLES AND HUMMUS SANDWICH

Virtually any kind of prepared hummus will work in this sandwich, but the roasted garlic variety lends an uncompromising oomph and flare. The zucchini and sweet pepper can be roasted stovetop on a grill pan if the weather is inclement. They can also be made early in the morning and just pulled out of the fridge as you're ready to assemble the sandwiches.

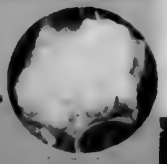
2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
1/4 tsp. each salt and pepper
1 large sweet red pepper, cored, seeded and quartered
1 large zucchini, trimmed and sliced thinly lengthwise into at least 8 long slices
1/2 cup prepared roasted garlic hummus
2 cups watercress
1 loaf ciabatta, cut into 4 pieces

In a small bowl, stir together the oil, salt and pepper. Brush over one side of the red pepper quarters. Place the red peppers on a preheated grill set over medium-high heat. Grill, turning occasionally, for about 20 minutes or until charred and very soft. Set aside.

Brush one side of each slice of zucchini. Grill, turning once and brushing the other side as you flip, for about 3 minutes per side or until nicely marked and very soft.

Cut each ciabatta quarter in half horizontally. Spread the hummus evenly over 4 halves. Top with a roasted red pepper quarter and two slices of zucchini (or more). Top with one-quarter of the watercress. Place other half of bread on top. Makes 4 sandwiches.

CAULIFLOWER PIZZA



1 cauliflower
2 tsp olive oil
1/2 tsp salt
1/2 tsp pepper
1 c red & yellow cherry tomatoes
3 garlic cloves
2 tbls chopped flatleaf parsley
1 tbl grated lemon zest.

Preheat oven to 400°. Line a baking pan with parchment paper. Break cauliflower into very small florets and place on baking pan. Drizzle with oil. Sprinkle with salt and pepper. Toss and roast 15 min. In a medium bowl, stir tomatoes, garlic, salt and pepper together. Add tomato mixture to cauliflower and mix together. Roast another 10 min. Transfer to bowl. Add parsley and lemon zest. Toss.

Jewish groups denounce Quebec values charter

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish groups reiterated their strong opposition to the proposed charter of Quebec values unveiled by the Parti Québécois (PQ) government on Sept. 10, three weeks after details were apparently leaked to the media.

From the pulpit on Yom Kippur, Rabbi Reuben Poupko of Congregation Beth Israel Beth Aaron called on all Jews – men and women – to wear kippot and Stars of David in public to protest what he views as an attack on civil liberties.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) and B'nai Brith Canada both believe the prohibition on religious headwear and other "conspicuous" symbols for public sector employees is contrary to the federal Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms.

"It is unacceptable and will only serve to inflame civil discourse," CIJA said in a strongly worded statement.

The proposed legislation is "discriminatory, arbitrary, provocative and will sow the seeds of division that the government claims it wishes to avoid."

It continued: "The government is rehashing old, out-of-context stories in order to generate support for the unwarranted attack on the basic rights and freedoms of Quebecers, all to find a solution to the so-called 'reasonable accommodation crisis,' which was largely recognized as fictitious."

The charter's stated aims are to reinforce state neutrality and the secular character of public institutions, as well as underline the equality of men and women.

CIJA counters that the separation of church and state is well entrenched and there's no need for new laws.

"The prohibition on wearing religious symbols in the public and para-public service is not justified, and would exclude a large number of Quebecers. The role of the state should be to bring people together, not to divide them," it says.

Syria weapons deal sets standard for Iran, Kerry says

JTA

JERUSALEM — U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry said the U.S.-Russia deal on the destruction of Syria's chemical weapons will also have an impact on Iran and that military action is still possible.

Following a meeting Sunday in Jerusalem with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Kerry told reporters that the agreement "will only be as efficient as its implementation will be" and that "[U.S.] President [Barack] Obama has made it clear that to accomplish this, the threat of force remains."

Kerry said the agreement reached the previous day between him and Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov "has the full ability to strip all of the chemical weapons from Syria." He also said that destroying Syria's chemical weapons arsenal sets a standard for Iran, and that the world must not allow "hollow words" to dominate international affairs.

Under the agreement, Syria would provide a full account of its chemical weapons stockpile within a week.

JGH Backs Workers

MONTREAL — The Jewish General Hospital (JGH) in Montreal said it supports its employees' freedom to wear religious symbols, no matter how overt. The hospital said that "the freedom of choice to wear conspicuous religious symbols does not impede the ability of its employees to deliver proper and timely services to the public" and that "as long as those services are offered with professional competence, courtesy and respect, the recipients' perceptions should not override the freedom of religion and the freedom of expression of hospital employees." The proposed charter of Quebec values unveiled by the Parti Québécois government Sept. 10 would let hospitals apply for a renewable, five-year exemption. The JGH thinks this might be impractical because some staff work at multiple institutions and may have to conform to varying dress codes if some had exemptions and some didn't.

WORLD

Young Jews Attacked

PARIS — Ten teens reportedly of African and North African origin assaulted 10 Jewish 13-year-olds from the Ner HaTorah private Jewish school at a public sports centre in Paris, Sept. 12. There were no serious injuries. The attackers reportedly asked the Jews to stop "occupying the area," called them "dirty Jews" and said "Hitler didn't finish the job" and shouted "Viva Palestine." The attackers fled when police arrived, according to a Sept. 13 report on the French Jewish news site JSSnews. Parents and pupils said the attack, in the 19th Arrondissement, turned into a fight as the Jewish pupils tried to defend themselves. The attackers may have been from a high school whose sports facilities the Jewish students are allowed to use.

Pope Praises Jews For Keeping Faith

ROME — Pope Francis praised Jews for keeping their faith despite the Holocaust and other "terrible trials" throughout history, and reaffirmed Judaism as the "holy root" of Christianity.

He made the statements in an unprecedented open letter to Eugenio Scalfari, a prominent Italian atheist and founding editor of the liberal newspaper La Repubblica.

The letter, published Sept. 11 on the front page of La Repubblica, came in response to editorials this summer by Scalfari directly addressing Francis on faith and religion.

The Pope's reply affirmed the necessity of open dialogue with non-believers, which he called "right and proper and precious." He also responded to Scalfari's query about "what we should say to our Jewish brothers about the promise made to them by God: has it all come to nothing?"

"Believe me," the Pope wrote, "this is a question that challenges us radically as Christians, because, with the help of God, especially since Vatican Council II, we have rediscovered that the Jewish people are still for us the holy root from which Jesus germinated."

The Pope said that particularly due to close ties with Jews in his native Argentina, he had often, in prayer, "questioned God, especially when my mind went to the memory of the terrible experience of the Shoah."

Shoah To Be Recalled

BUDAPEST — A disused Budapest train station will soon become a $22-million Holocaust memorial centre. The Hungarian prime minister's chief of staff said it will feature an educational centre and will be opened by spring 2014 at Budapest's Jozsefvaros train station. That timing coincides with the 70th anniversary of the rapid deportation of 437,000 Hungarian Jews, which began in the spring of 1944.

Home dialysis gives dad time with newborn

Abigail Cukier
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Just a couple months after setting up a nursery for their newborn, Arie and Joy Pekar dedicated another room in their home to dialysis treatment.

Arie started dialysis on June 19 and, on June 23, he and Joy welcomed a baby, Benjamin, who arrived three weeks early, into their home.

Earlier this month, Arie started home hemodialysis so he could spend less time away from his family.

Arie has polycystic kidney disease, which causes cysts to develop and interfere with the organ's ability to filter waste from the blood. In addition, the disease makes you exceptionally tired, as the kidney is responsible for creating a hormone that triggers the body to create red blood cells. It can also cause nausea, skin conditions and trouble with digestion.

Arie's mother, Ilana, has had the disease for decades, and after learning he had very high blood pressure, Arie was tested. At age 21, he found out he had inherited the genetic condition.

Because Arie, now 33, was diagnosed early and while he was in good health, doctors were optimistic about his prognosis. But despite preventive treatments and a healthy lifestyle, his disease is progressing quickly.

Arie and his mom both need kidney transplants. Friends and family have been tested as donors and ruled out.

Since the couple went public with their story last January, several people have come forward for testing, but so far, no one has been a suitable match.

His doctors had hoped Arie would get a transplant before he needed to start dialysis, as that would help his prognosis. But this spring, it became clear he would need to start the treatment.

Israel's security situation quietly improves

With the intense focus in western media over the past few weeks on confusion surrounding U.S. policy regarding Syria, several interesting developments elsewhere in the Middle East have gone largely unnoticed.

Some of these developments are surprisingly positive where Israel is concerned, an ironic situation given the general state of chaos and turmoil affecting so much of the region.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Recent unexpected changes stemming mainly from the Egyptian army's July overthrow of former president Mohammed Morsi and the Muslim Brotherhood have resulted today in improved security on Israel's southern border.

Specifically, Egypt has been involved in an unprecedented military campaign to regain control of what, for years, was widely acknowledged as its "lawless" Sinai Peninsula. Jihadist and even some Al Qaeda-affiliated groups with the assistance of radicalized Bedouin have used the Sinai as a launching pad for attacks on both Egyptian security forces and Israel, including, in the latter case, missile attacks targeting Eilat.

In mid-August, when 25 Egyptian police were ambushed and killed execution-style by Islamic militants in the northern Sinai, Egypt decided the time had finally come to act decisively. To do so, it needed Israel's co-operation in permitting more Egyptian troops and heavy military equipment in the Sinai than are allowed under the 1979 Egypt-Israel peace agreement.

Amos Harel in Ha'aretz reported on this co-operation: "Although [Egypt and Israel] want to keep their warmer relationship under wraps, it is hard to ignore the fact that they enjoy not only tactical co-operation on the ground, but also a convergence of strategic interests. Considering the dramatic chain of events in Egypt since 2011, it is very hard to predict the coming months, but at least in the short term, Israel's security situation on its southern and western fronts has seen a major change for the better."

In Gaza, Hamas also has suffered a major setback.

"Egyptian pressure on Hamas has meant it will not dare even think about firing rockets at Israel or allowing smaller Palestinian factions to do so. The Hamas leadership in Gaza, still surprised and bruised by the violent and effective way the leaders of their sister movement, the Muslim Brotherhood, were deposed in Cairo, are careful to obey," Harel wrote.

In its Sept. 7 article "Lonely Hamas," the Economist described Hamas' growing isolation and an irony involving Israel: Hamas has increasingly had to turn to Israel to provide more of the basic necessities, such as fuel, that it used to receive from Egypt. The impact on Hamas has had some surprising effects.

As the Economist noted: "At Friday prayers, some Hamas preachers curse Egypt more than Israel. Hamas border guards arrest and even shoot anyone trying to break the ceasefire with Israel. The 300,000-odd Israelis living in easy rocket range of the border with Gaza are enjoying a rare bout of calm."

As to changes in the wider region, the Jerusalem Post's Yaakov Lappin reported (Sept. 8) on a talk given by senior Israeli Defence Ministry official Maj.-Gen. Amos Gilad to the Institute for Counter-Terrorism's international summit in Herzliya. "An axis of Sunni states [Turkey, Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and other Gulf countries] has taken form in the region, which [in Gilad's words] 'does not view Israel as a sworn enemy' and has successfully kept extremist jihadi terrorism at bay," Lappin wrote.

He quoted Gilad that this alliance, – which views the United States as the sole superpower – is of "huge importance" to Israel, even though it will never be accepted as a formal member.

Left unsaid is that there is growing concern among some of the Sunni states that in light of perceived indecision over Syria, the United States' role has been diminished and Russia's enhanced, including its strengthened alliance with Iran. Shia Iran, after all, remains the dominant threat to Sunni states' stability as well as to Israel's security.

Although the situation may shift again, any news about Israel's improved strategic position with some of its Arab neighbours is reason to feel encouraged.

RIDE FOR KIDS: For the third time in as many years, Jewish National Fund Toronto partnered with the Hard Chargers Law Enforcement Motorcycle Club to raise awareness and funds for the 40 prison wardens who were killed in the 2010 Carmel forest fire in Israel. About 80 participants in the Correctional Officers Ride, held Sept. 8 in Newmarket, Ont., raised more than $10,000 for an educational scholarship fund set up for the children of the fallen Israeli wardens. Zionism's unfinished business

Rabbi Tarfon's oft-quoted adage in the Ethics of our Fathers, "the work [of perfecting the world] is not yours to complete, but neither are you free to desist from it," holds true for Israel and its supporters.

Earlier generations succeeded in creating a strong, viable and vibrant state. Consider three of their many achievements: first, superior technological and military capabilities that enable Israel to defend itself against virtually any threat; second, an active democracy with effective civil society organizations and an independent judiciary that, for the most part, encourages debate and dissent in the public square, and third, the transformation of Hebrew into a rich language that gives dynamic expression to the country's boundless creativity and spirit.

But earlier generations didn't complete the work. Israel continues to confront three contentious challenges that must be resolved for it to prosper into the future. All are intertwined with the overarching, unsettled question of the country's dual self-definition as a "Jewish and democratic state" – the full meaning of which has yet to be clarified.

The first challenge is the role of religion in public life. For decades, numerous efforts to articulate a model that's right for Israel have foundered on the shoals of political barriers, although the recent Religion and State Index of the Hiddush Association showed that 61 per cent of Israeli Jews favour greater separation of religion and state and widespread opposition to the Orthodox Chief Rabbinate's monopoly on personal-status issues.

The second challenge is Israel's treatment of its non-Jewish minority. Twenty per cent of the country's eight million citizens are Arab, and the question of their equality and loyalty remains a festering sore. In a Jewish state, they're second class. In a democracy, they're equal. Squaring this circle is a formidable task.

The third challenge is territorial. Ultimately, Israel can't thrive without defined borders and a two-state resolution of its conflict with the Palestinians. Real security concerns notwithstanding, removing this "elephant from the room" is essential for the country's identity, demography, international standing and morality. Last week, Science Minister Yaacov Peri reiterated, "everyone knows that a bi-national state is the end of Zionism."

This is where the three challenges are joined: ending the occupation will assure Israel a Jewish majority and buttress its democracy, allowing an open discussion of its dual character.

In the current Knesset, some lawmakers prefer to retreat inwardly by introducing proposals for a new Basic Law that will shift the balance to Israel's Jewish identity over its democratic principles. This could easily become a slippery slope.

Rabbi Dow Marmur's recent statement, in this paper, that "Canadian Jewry needs a Peter Beinart" and Consul General DJ Schneeweiss' comment that "Israel must include all Jews" are exhortations to embrace, rather than avoid, the difficult conversations we must have on the unfinished business of Zionism. And they are a call to do so in a big, inclusive and diverse tent that respects differences and values listening.

The task may not be completed in our lifetime, but we cannot desist from it, and we may emerge stronger for it.

Unity is important

As Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz beautifully elucidates ("Who is your bad Jew?" The CJN, Aug. 15), Rabbi Naftali Zvi Yehudah Berlin establishes an obligation to maintain inter-communal unity among all Jews. To that effect, it is interesting to note how Rabbi Berlin's response continues that the purpose of such inter-communal unity is to build a system of education that follows the Talmud and Shulchan Aruch, and where all the academic studies (including secular subjects) are taught by scholars who fear Heaven.

In my opinion, this caveat of Rabbi Berlin means that his unity prescription parallels the unity prescription of Rabbi Joseph Ber Soloveitchik, the latter envisaging inter-communal alliances on matters of klapei chutz (external social efforts to benefit humanity), while maintaining Orthodox independence on matters of klapei pnim (internal halachic matters). Inspired by Rabbi Berlin and Rabbi Soloveitchik's message – particularly as elaborated by Rabbi Steinmetz – we can indeed achieve Jewish unity, thereby enriching our common destiny.

It's truth, not jingoism

The writer of the letter "Columnist too jingoistic" (The CJN, Aug. 29) is as wrong and confused about Cuba as he is about Israel. The Stalinists in Cuba have executed 15,000 to 17,000 people and currently have thousands of political prisoners. The writer calls truth "jingoism" when the facts about Israel, or facts presented about abusive leftist regimes, do not coincide with, or somehow impinge on, his own hard-wired false beliefs.

Many modern Jew haters now use "Zionist" as a weasel substitute for "Jews" to hide from the fact that anti-Zionism is indeed anti-Semitism. Left-wing Jews are becoming more vocal, more one-sided against Israel, less willing to listen to the truth and wholly open and receptive to the lies – lies from Jewish Jew-haters, Islamist groups sponsored by terrorists, leftist professors and "religious" leaders who blame all the ills of the world on Israel.

I hope that our mainstream Jewish groups will one day stand up to equivocators and propagandists who have turned the pride of Israel into incessant rage against a country and a people. Some people are bent on shrinking or destroying Israel for the sake of Arab dictators and Islamic terrorists so that they can grab the one country in the region that has evaded their conquest.

Michaels is fair and even-handed

Letter writer Ben Barkow goes overboard when he claims that CJN columnist Paul Michaels is "too jingoistic" in his writing ("Columnist too jingoistic" The CJN, Aug. 29). The letter writer recommends that your newspaper stop carrying his columns.

I have been reading Michaels' columns for a number of years now, and I have always found his writing to be lucid, informative and even-handed. He manages to take a cutting-edge issue – e.g., Iran's pursuit of nuclear weapons – and treat the issue fairly, in the context of reviewing the coverage from major news outlets. The fact his column represents a good "news watch" feature (something not-too-common in Canadian journalism) adds to what makes it interesting.

I disagree with the ugly tone of Barkow's letter. He says that Michaels' writing caters to a "small, nasty segment of your readership." Michaels' point-of-view differs little from that of most of the other opinion writers in The CJN.

Community divided by JCC closure

The UJA campaign launch begs to be congratulated for its success ("UJA campaign off to record start," The CJN, Aug. 29). However, your article stated that UJA Federation of Greater Toronto unifies the community. I beg to differ. The Jewish community centre on Bathurst Street was torn down, dispersing its members to other centres, including more than 200 members to the Columbus Centre. The result was not unifying. Instead, it separated the community. Here we are, three years later, and we still don't have a JCC to act as a second home to seniors, Holocaust survivors, and squash, racquetball and tennis players.

Perhaps because those decision-makers were so shortsighted, we are no longer the unified community we once were.

Twenty years later, debate on Oslo accords rages

Alex Traiman
JNS.org

Twenty years after the signing of the fateful Oslo accords between Palestinian Liberation Organization chairman Yasser Arafat and Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, MKs are heavily debating the merits of the peace process and the two-state solution paradigm.

Parliamentarians from both Israel's left and the right agree that the process has not yielded the results anyone would have hoped for, including the deaths of more than 1,000 Israelis and 3,000 Palestinians, and they agree that Israelis and Palestinians are more skeptical than ever about the prospects for a negotiated settlement.

Where Knesset members disagree is on whether the process was flawed from the outset, and on whether the principles that led to the signing of the interim peace agreement should still be applied. Consequently, the 20-year anniversary of the Oslo accords – signed Sept. 13, 1993 – is not a celebration of the agreement's outcome, but rather a debate on its merits.

"The main lesson is that the paradigm of the left, that land for peace will bring security to the region, has failed, and this is the time to think clearly that we should not endorse a Palestinian state," MK and Deputy Defence Minister Danny Danon of the Likud party told JNS.org.

MK Hilik (Yehiel) Bar, secretary general of the Labor party and deputy speaker of the Knesset, said to think about the alternatives to the Oslo accords and to Israeli-Palestinian conflict negotiations "is foolish, unfair, and it will not happen."

"There is no other option than to have a Jewish state and a Palestinian state that is based on the '67 borders," Bar told JNS.org.

Currently, details of the new round of Israeli-Palestinian conflict negotiations, which were announced in July, are largely being kept from the public. The negotiations are being advanced by U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry and Martin Indyk, former U.S. ambassador to Israel. Indyk has come under scrutiny for serving on the board of the New Israel Fund, a left-leaning NGO that heavily funds anti-settlement and anti-religious activity.

Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, left, U.S. president Bill Clinton, centre, and PLO chairman Yasser Arafat at the historic signing. (Vince Musi/The White House)

While Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas appear to be entertaining the possibility that a peace settlement can be reached through the current round of negotiations, most Israelis and Palestinians aren't paying much attention.

In an unusual turn of events, members of Israel's governing coalition and the prime minister's party are coming out against negotiations, while members of the opposition are supporting the government's initiative.

"The prime minister said clearly that he supports negotiations without preconditions. Yet he hasn't said where he stands on the outcome of negotiations," said Likud's Danon.

"I think the Israelis are waking up and they have understood that the idea is not valid anymore, and we see more and more Israelis shifting. We should not endorse any idea that we will give land to the Palestinians," he said.

Labor's Bar, however, believes it is the very distrust between Israelis and Palestinians that makes segregating Israel into two separate states a necessity. Bar insists that if peace efforts had played out only slightly differently, the creation of an independent Palestinian state in the West Bank could have resulted.

"We had three major attempts to make peace," said Bar. "One was Rabin-Arafat. The treaty was signed. But as we know, Rabin was shot down by a Jewish terrorist. There is no way to know what would have happened if Rabin was still alive."

The second attempt was between Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak and Arafat, according to Bar. During those negotiations, Barak offered Arafat more than 95 per cent of the West Bank for a Palestinian state. Arafat famously rejected the offer, and embarrassed mediating U.S. president Bill Clinton in the process.

"Arafat chose to die as a shahid [martyr], not as a peacemaker. That was his choice," Bar said.

In the third round, between Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert and Abbas, "Both sides say that it was Olmert's legal complications within Israel that prevented the negotiations from going all the way," Bar said.

While the three rounds of negotiations ultimately resulted in increasing distrust, intifadahs, Israeli military operations, and a unilateral Israeli withdrawal from Gaza, Bar suggested that Israeli-Palestinian conflict negotiations may still deliver results.

"This current Knesset has a very clear majority for the two-state solution. I think that more than 70 Knesset members would vote for a two-state solution if brought for a vote," Bar told JNS.org.

"The status quo is unsustainable," he said.

Other Knesset members are not as optimistic that negotiations will cure decades of unrest.

"Everytime you try a certain medicine and it doesn't work, you need to either realize the medicine doesn't work or re-analyze the disease," said Deputy Transportation Minister Tzipi Hotevely (Likud).

"Oslo was based on three incorrect assumptions," Hotevely said. "The first assumption is that the conflict is about territory. The second assumption is that Arabs and Jews should not live together, and that segregation and separate states can create peaceful existence. The third assumption was that the conflict was about 1967."

"[Prime Minister Ariel] Sharon proposed segregation, with the unilateral disengagement from Gaza," she said. "The result was radicalism. Hamas took over. Gaza didn't become Singapore like many hoped it would. Instead, rockets started falling on Sderot."

As to whether the current peace talks will yield results, Hotevely is certain they won't.

"I'm sure Bibi Netanyahu has goodwill, but the talks will fail. The reason is because the conflict is not about [Israeli territorial expansion in] 1967, it is about Israel's independence in 1948," Hotevely said. "The conflict is not about territory. The conflict is religious. It may be difficult for liberals to realize that the conflict may not have a logical solution."

"We've been there, we've done that. We've tried it. It failed. We need to try something else," she said.

Meanwhile, the debate on Oslo continues.

Israel must tread carefully amid chaos in Arab world

Gerald Steinberg
in Jerusalem

With deadly street battles between the military and the Muslim Brotherhood in Cairo; rocket attacks and chemical weapons in the Syrian civil war; car bombs targeting Shiites and Sunnis in Lebanon and Iraq; repeated assaults against Christian minorities, and more, occurring on a daily basis it should be clear that the Middle East really is a dangerous neighbourhood.

This description isn't a "right-wing Zionist myth" but the core environment in which Israel must operate, requiring great caution in selecting policies and responses.

In contrast to this complex reality, far too many "experts" – journalists, academics, politicians and diplomats – continue to offer the same simplistic mantras for solving conflicts and bringing peace. They speak and write with an air of great certainty about issues and situations that are inherently uncertain and constantly changing.

In reality, there are no magic or short-term solutions, and outsiders, no matter how well-meaning or powerful, including the president of the United States, are entirely incapable of imposing solutions. The best they can do is follow the Hippocratic oath taken by doctors: do no harm.

Indeed, the quick transformation of the Arab Spring into inhuman slaughter highlights the need for a strong and sobering dose of humility among analysts from all perspectives. Two years ago, most policymakers and opinion leaders in the West were excitedly predicting a new dawn as Arab totalitarian regimes and petty dictatorships were overthrown to make way for democracy and freedom.

They confidently forecast that in Libya and Syria, the Gadhafi and Assad regimes would soon be replaced by tolerant and peace-loving liberal regimes, like (or almost like) in Europe and North America. In Egypt, the evil military regime had been ousted, and democracy had supposedly triumphed. In the commentaries and policy pronouncements, these romantic facades replaced the clearly stated core objectives of the Muslim Brotherhood, Al Qaeda and other jihadists.

Similarly, according to the accepted wisdom (introduced with words such as "everyone knows" or "it is obvious that"), an agreement to create a Palestinian state in the West Bank, end the "occupation," "share" Jerusalem and set mass terrorists free became the necessary ingredients for a peaceful Middle East.

The daily incitement from the Palestinian leadership, the ongoing violence and the intense power struggle between Hamas and the PLO are replaced by imagined signs of mutual understanding. And in this rosy fairy tale, a Palestinian state would be insulated from the terrible violence and chaos that is the norm everywhere else in the Arab world.

In parallel, the powerful leaders of non-governmental organizations (NGOs) such as Human Rights Watch, Amnesty International, Oxfam and their partners frequently issue authoritative statements on the Middle East that reinforce the facade. Journalists (including at the CBC) confuse these empty pronouncements as substantive analysis and do no independent fact-checking. While obsessively spreading false accusations against Israel, the real war crimes, mass killings and daily human rights violations in the Arab world were ignored. It should be obvious that the narrow ideological officials who control many of the political advocacy NGOs got everything wrong, but they keep churning out sound bites.

For the consumers on the other end of all of this expertise and advice on the Middle East, the first recommendation is caveat emptor – buyer beware. The majority of Israelis have learned this lesson the hard way, and 20 years after the disastrous "Oslo peace process," simple-minded analysis and easy prescriptions are viewed with a healthy dose of skepticism. We know that there's no comparison between our neighbourhood and Europe or North America, and that mass violence is not due to differences over where to draw borders or "ending the occupation." Without fundamental changes in Arab and Muslim societies, whatever policies Israel adopts are irrelevant.

And for the journalists, academics, political activists and others who kindly offer us advice from far away, a little humility would go a long way. Before they repeat the conventional wisdom and usual mantras about Israel, they might spend some time observing the violent conflicts being waged in Cairo, Damascus, Baghdad and across the Arab world. To avoid being pulled into this chaos, Israel's leaders must choose its policies very carefully and avoid recycled and simplistic slogans.

Appreciating our Judaism through a sojourn in India

Yair Lootsteen
in Jerusalem

My family and I spent most of August on a journey through parts of India, and I haven't quite returned home yet.

We visited Mumbai and Delhi for a couple of days each, but most of our time was spent discovering Ladakh, a remote and sparsely populated Himalayan region, magnificently nestled in the north-western Indian state of Jammu and Kashmir, bordering both Tibet, in China, and Pakistan. Due to its high altitude and extreme winters, it's open to tourists for only a few months each year.

I know this isn't a travel column, and although I highly recommend this trip to others similarly inclined and will happily give my two cents to anyone who might want them, I won't tire you with the details of our journey. Suffice it to say it was a wonderful family experience, not devoid of challenges (my son got acute stomach poisoning), and India with all its contrasts – religious, cultural and scenic splendours juxtaposed against extraordinary poverty and a literal sea of humanity – is a place I'll surely visit again.

And while it wasn't the focus of our trip, our travels also provided opportunities to examine who we are as Jews and Israelis.

To start with, our family has an Indian-Jewish connection. My wife's late mother was of Indian heritage, having spent some of her formative years in Bombay – today's Mumbai. We visited synagogues still active, including the wonderful, ornate Magen David where she and her parents prayed, the neighbourhood where she grew up and the Jewish cemetery where we said Kaddish at the grave of my wife's great-grandfather, a rabbinic scholar who travelled to India from Yemen in the late 19th century to become a spiritual mentor to the distinguished Sassoon family.

It was wonderful meeting family members still living in Mumbai.

We came across hundreds of Israelis, mostly 20-somethings recently released from IDF military service. They come in droves to decompress, are known locally for doing just a bit too many drugs, and gather in particular towns and villages. In Leh, Ladakh's regional capital and in Manali, in Himachal Pradesh, they are numerous. Many shops advertise in Hebrew, some merchants speak the language pretty well, and restaurants serve schnitzel, hummus, and Israeli salad.

Like it or not, this is the scene.

Buddhism prevails in these parts, with hundreds of temples, enticing, accessible and tangible in their aesthetic beauty and friendly monks. We met Israeli youngsters who appeared to have been smitten spiritually. Others connect to their roots through the work of places such as Habayit HaYehudi in Leh. Known by locals as Jew House and run by a young Orthodox couple from Jerusalem, it's an anchor for Jewish kids, especially secular Israelis over-exposed to India's raw spirituality and in need of reminders that they have a spiritual home of their own. We joined a couple hundred of them one Friday evening for Kabbalat Shabbat, and although we're used to a more pluralistic brand of Judaism, after a week of countless temple visits, praying wheels and fabulous golden Buddhas, it was refreshing to bring in Shabbat with songs and prayers we felt at home with.

Other experiences reminded me of home. In the big cities, airport-style metal detectors are the norm when entering hotels, malls and major tourist sites.

During our stay, a border altercation with Pakistani insurgents left five Indian soldiers dead and the nation in mourning. We learned of persistent tensions between India and Pakistan, and India and China.

Travelling in Ladakh, one can't help noticing a large military presence, with huge bases, military convoys, roadblocks, and permits required for travel to certain areas, while others are completely out of bounds to foreigners.

We visited the Hall of Fame, a memorial in Leh to hundreds of Indian soldiers killed during the Kargil War of 1999 (previously unbeknownst to me) between India and Pakistan. It reminded me of similar memorials to battles and soldiers here in Israel. Being a neutral outsider, it seemed to me that so many had died because of futile territorial gamesmanship by all sides.

And another thing. Most Indians we met know little if anything about Israel and the conflicts afflicting our region. It was refreshing not to find anything about us in the press.

Returning to our own war drums here in Israel, we're still breathing the thin air of the Himalayas, a bit more appreciative of what we have at home.

Ryerson buys time for decision on Sam's signs

CJN Staff

The decision on the future of two massive spinning records that used to adorn Sam the Record Man's Yonge Street frontage in downtown Toronto has been put off for a year.

Last week, the Toronto and East York Community Council agreed to give Ryerson University extra time to come up with a plan for the two-storey neon-lit signs.

The record-selling business that would become Sam the Record Man was founded by Sam Sniderman in 1937. The flashy neon signs at the centre of the issue were installed in 1961 and to many became iconic and synonymous with the bustle and excitement of Yonge Street.

Ryerson acquired the signs when it purchased the Sam the Record Man property in 2008. At the time, Toronto City Council was considering designating the property, on Yonge just north of Dundas Street, under the Ontario Heritage Act. As a condition of purchase, Ryerson agreed to store the signs and re-install them when it completed its Student Learning Centre on the site.

In November 2012, Ryerson informed the City of Toronto that it proposed a three-part alternative to re-mounting the signs. Citing potential environmental concerns over mercury in the neon tubing and a shortage of qualified sign experts, the school proposed an alternative way to commemorate the once-iconic store.

Ryerson suggested creating a replica sign in the sidewalk in front of what used to be the store, as well as a commemorative insert telling the store's story. It would also launch a website recognizing the significance of the store as part of a tribute to "Music on Yonge Street – celebrating 70 years of Sam's."

Ryerson denied cost was a factor, though media reports put the price at restoring the signage at $250,000.

City staff approved Ryerson's proposal, but opposition grew from a number of sources, including city council. A petition that, as of last week, had garnered more than 1,100 signatures called on the city to hold Ryerson to the terms of its contract.

"The agreement between Toronto and Ryerson University was that they would put the Sam the Record Man sign back up after it was removed for construction," stated the petition, addressed to city councilors. "Now the city is going to let them out of this deal because Ryerson doesn't like the aestehtics, feels it will be expensive, and a myriad of other complaints that frankly are not relevant because they are just not our problem. The only thing that's relevant is that they were allowed to build at this location if they agreed to put the sign back up. So they should."

"We're asking the city to do the absolute bare minimum, and make Ryerson honour the deal they made with the people of Toronto... Ryerson made a legal pledge to us, and now we just want them to honour the deal. End of story."

Sniderman is remembered as a mentor to many in the Canadian music industry and has been called the Godfather of Canadian Music. He died in 2012 at age 92.

Cast and crew celebrate 20 years of Sailor Moon

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Twenty years after its original airing in Japan, Sailor Moon is still recognized as one of the most influential cartoons of its genre in North America.

And at this year's Fan Expo in Toronto, members of the original cast and crew celebrated the milestone with a panel discussion featuring voice actors Linda Ballantyne (Sailor Moon), Katie Griffin (Sailor Mars), Susan Roman (Sailor Jupiter) and Toby Proctor (Tuxedo Mask), as well as voice director John Stocker.

The Sailor Moon series was the Toronto Jewish voice director's first time in that position, and it has since led to him working as director on a number of cartoons, including Totally Spies, Redakai, and Caillou. Stocker is also well known for his voice-acting work, perhaps most famously as Beastly in the Care Bears.

But the Sailor Moon reunion brought back together a cast that he described as particularly special.

"Sometimes you do get together with a cast where everybody just gets along, and not only do they get along during the time we're recording, but years down the road, we have times like this where it gets even stronger, and the reflections are wonderful and we enjoy working as a team and we've become even better friends," Stocker said at the Fan Expo panel talk.

Despite several change in voice actors over the course of the series, and the fact the crew had to work on a low budget, it had a lasting impact.

For many young girls, Sailor Moon was their first introduction to anime, and it gave them a show about a group of women – the Sailor Scouts – who weren't afraid to get their hands dirty as they fought for love and justice.

Stocker said it was the first time young girls ever saw "girl power" in all its glory in a cartoon, which may explain why so many have been touched by it.

At Fan Expo, one woman thanked the panelists for their work in bringing the show to Canada, showing her that anybody – even a goofy "meatball head," a reference to Sailor Moon's trademark hairstyle – can do good.

Stocker said many fans express similar sentiments to him and the cast.

"Some refer to individual scouts as being guiding forces, role models or mentors," he told The CJN. "[The voice actors are] often thanked for giving them something they've been able to pass along to and share with their daughters."

He said a lot of mothers "cosplay" – short for costume play – with their daughters at the conventions, with both dressed as scouts.

The mere fact that so many people showed up to Fan Expo dressed in Sailor Scout uniforms demonstrated how long the show's influence has lasted, even though Stocker said he and most of the voice actors had no idea of its impact until years after it aired.

"I had already dropped it off my resume," he said. "Then, when I did Fan Expo a few years ago, I looked around and talked to a lot of people. Suddenly it really hit me. This thing is huge."

Fans will be happy to know that coinciding with Sailor Moon's 20th anniversary, creator Naoko Takeuchi announced a reboot of the series. It's set to debut this winter, although it hasn't been announced whether Stocker and his voice actors will return to work on an English dub.

They all expressed interest at the panel, and Stocker urged fans to contact the production company – rumoured to be Toonami – to tell them they'd like the original crew back together.

"You want to hear this gang, you want to see all of us again doing Season 6, we'd love to do it," he said.

But if he had the opportunity to get involved with the reboot, he has one thing he would change.

"I'd take my time with it," he said. "It was recorded in too much of a hurry. Sometimes we had to sacrifice production and performance values for the sake of budget. Can you imagine how amazing it would be if we had the time to pay attention to a little more detail?"

Initiative praised by Centre for Jewish Education

Jewish schools partner on ad campaign

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

For the first time, eight Jewish day schools in the Greater Toronto Area have partnered on a marketing campaign to entice parents to "choose Jewish" for their children's education.

The centre-spread ad, which ran in last week's CJN, posted the dates and times for open houses for Associated Hebrew Schools, the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School, Bialik Hebrew Day School, Zareinu Education Centre, Leo Baeck Day School, the Toronto Heschel School and Robbins Hebrew Academy.

The group plans to run two more back-page ads in the Sept. 25 and Oct. 10 issues of The CJN.

Cayla Solomon, Bialik's marketing and communications manager, who took the lead on this campaign, said it began as a discussion about what information the schools could share that would benefit them all.

"From that came the idea of doing these joint ads, mostly because we felt that we're all in the same business here in the sense that we're each selling our own brand of Jewish education. But at the end of the day, we all felt that as long as these kids were ending up in a Jewish school, we're all happy," Solomon said.

Cayla Solomon

"The overarching message needed to be 'Choose Jewish education.' You can decide what is the right school for you, but choose Jewish education."

Advertising logo being run in The CJN and other newspapers

Chuck English, Associated's marketing communications co-ordinator, praised Solomon for seeing the potential in bringing together the marketing representatives of various Jewish day schools and for taking the initiative.

He explained that a few years ago, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Centre for Jewish Education (CJE) facilitated meetings with the marketing co-ordinators at each of the day schools.

"It sort of fizzled out a bit," Solomon said. "I figured we needed to take it on ourselves. We weren't excluding [CJE], we just felt we needed to take ownership of it."

CJE executive director Ed Segalowitz applauded the schools' marketing directors for taking the initiative to create a joint campaign.

"I think it's terrific, it's very effective, [and] it's a good use of the school funds that are available. I think it's creative and I congratulate them," he said, adding that the schools' marketing co-ordinators have said they like to handle their own ad campaigns.

What separates the joint ad from the ones the schools run separately is that, "we're marketing the category and not just the brand," English said.

"For example, there is a milk marketing board that promotes the consumption of milk, but you can buy your milk from six different companies," he explained.

"If we can drive people to make a decision to attend Jewish day schools, and you bring more people into the system, then everyone will get their fair share."

Sheri Rapp, who is charge of marketing and admissions for Paul Penna, said in addition to presenting themselves as a community of Jewish educators, this campaign also benefits the schools financially by splitting ad costs.

"On the one hand, it's partially a financial thing, but it is much more than that really, because it is very much the schools wanting to say that we're partners in this, we're co-operating, it's a community, we are not competitors," Rapp said.

English said partnerships like this one are rare in the Jewish community.

"These schools represent completely different religious philosophies. The only thing they have in common is day school education. When is the last time you saw a group of synagogues get together to encourage people to join any synagogue?"

Rapp hopes the ads, which are also running twice in Post City Magazines, and will run in an upcoming issue of the National Post, will at least encourage parents to come out to the open houses and learn about what the schools have to offer.

"Once they actually come into the schools, they'll be pleased with what they see."

Rapp said she understands that Jewish day school tuition in Toronto – which ranges from about $12,000 a year to more than $23,000 – can be a big financial burden for many families.

"As much as possible we need to make subsidies available... It can be heartbreaking when you hear stories about people who desperately want it and there are reasons why they couldn't do it on their own," Rapp said.

"I think all schools understand the struggle that parents are going through," Solomon added.

"At Bialik, our go-to line is, 'No Jewish child should be denied a Bialik Jewish education,' and we really try to do whatever we can to be accommodating to struggling families."

Segalowitz said that making the sacrifice to provide children with a Jewish education is just one of the many difficult choices Jewish families need to make.

"If you believe in your Jewish values and believe, as a Jew, in the future of your people and the power and joy of Jewish values and traditions for your children, then you make those choices," he said.

Rapp said even parents who insist they can't afford the tuition should come out to the open houses.

"If you're interested in going, you should at least come to the open houses, apply, let people at the schools know about your financial situation and the schools will do what they can to help you. There is nothing to lose by inquiring and putting in the subsidy request... You shouldn't be afraid to at least take the first step."

Cancer survivor can relate to Israeli vets

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Canadian journalist Libby Znaimer knows what it takes to survive against all odds and how to overcome the challenges of rehabilitation.

Znaimer has successfully battled not one, but two cancers: breast cancer in 2006, and pancreatic cancer – the most lethal kind of all – in 2008.

On Oct. 8, Zoomer Media's vice-president of news and information for Classical 96.3FM and AM740, will share her story as the honoree at Beit Halochem Canada's Woman of Distinction Award luncheon.

The event, to be held at the Oakdale Golf and Country Club, will raise funds for Beit Halochem, an Israeli organization that helps 51,000 wounded veterans and victims of terror to recover from their injuries and psychological trauma.

From her office in Zoomer Media's headquarters in Toronto's Liberty Village neighbourhood, Znaimer spoke candidly about her unlikely survival story, as well as her lifelong connection to Israel and its people.

Having grown up in a Zionist home with her older brother, Canadian media mogul Moses Znaimer, the self-proclaimed "staunch" Zionist had even entertained the idea of making aliyah.

"Many people aren't aware, but I lived in Israel for nearly five years when I was younger… I was there shortly after the Yom Kippur War, which was very traumatic for people," she recalled.

"I got my first job in journalism with the Associated Press in Tel Aviv and I covered terrorist attacks."

One of the attacks she covered was the Coastal Road massacre of 1978, regarded as one of the worst terrorist attacks in Israel's history, which involved the hijacking of a bus. In the attack, 38 Israelis, including 13 children, were killed, and 71 were wounded.

"It was quite traumatic. I've seen all of that. So it's very meaningful for me."

She said her personal experience with recovery and rehabilitation has made her connection to Israeli victims of war and terror even stronger.

"It's hard enough when there are no visible signs [of injury] on you. When it comes to cancer, some people have different lasting problems and some people don't. I'm very lucky that I don't. To have to recover with a disability, I mean, I can't even wrap my head around it."

Libby Znaimer

Znaimer was in her 50s when she found a lump in her breast that turned out to be cancer. After her diagnosis, she tested positive for BRCA2, a genetic mutation more prevalent in Ashkenazi Jews that increases the likelihood of developing breast, ovarian and pancreatic cancer.

In 2008, a year after she endured months of surgery, chemo and radiation, Znaimer learned that she had pancreatic cancer, a disease that has a five-year survival rate of about four per cent.

She was lucky that her pancreatic cancer was detected before it spread. But it was wrapped around a main artery and vein and couldn't be operated on unless her doctors succeeded in shrinking the tumour. Znaimer and her doctors decided to try an experimental treatment to shrink the pancreatic tumour by targeting the BRCA2 mutation.

Today, the growing number of pancreatic cancer survivors can credit Znaimer, the national spokesperson for Pancreatic Cancer Canada – a foundation that raises awareness and funds for the fourth biggest cancer killer in North America – for being the first patient to test out a treatment plan that has had some success in treating a cancer that is largely considered incurable.

"No one was more surprised than my doctors when it worked," Znaimer said.

"They started treating people with the BRCA mutation that way and they respond better to treatment… I think I probably responded way better than the average, but what they started to do is they test every case for BRCA now at Princess Margaret [Cancer Centre in Toronto] and some other places," she explained. "It's a big advancement for a small subset of patients. Literally, I was just about the first case. I'm lucky that it wasn't the next person."

Beit Halochem luncheon chair Susan Flam said she is thrilled to be able to recognize Znaimer as a woman of distinction.

"Not only is she professionally accomplished as a journalist, broadcaster, and radio executive, but she has braved and won her battle with cancer and she supports many cancer-related causes. She gives back," Flam said.

"Both the veterans and the honoree have a kinship with each other, because all of them have faced major roadblocks in their lives. They have had really arduous journeys to regain control of their lives."

Hanoch Budin, an Israeli veteran who served in Lebanon in 1982, where he lost an arm in an explosion, and who went on to win eight swimming medals at the Paralympic Games, will also speak at the luncheon.

For tickets, call 905-695-0611, or visit www.beithalochem.ca.

Community condemns proposed charter

B'nai Brith believes the proposed charter is unconstitutional because it violates religious expression guarantees. It said it is prepared to intervene if the federal government mounts a court challenge.

"Instead of promoting equality and justice and seeking a better society for all, the proposed charter of values discriminates against persons of faith and transforms them into second-class citizens," said lawyer Allan Adel, national chair of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights.

"This is one of the most unconstitutional moves a government can make. The very notion that the government will be in the business of deciding what constitutes a 'large and conspicuous' religious item is simply ludicrous."

Reaction from other parts of the Jewish community was also condemnatory.

Business consultant Arthur Hiess, who has a long record of defending minority rights, said the proposed charter "harks back to the restrictions imposed on Jews" by authoritarian regimes historically.

Jews have lived in Quebec since the 1700s, and their values are part and parcel of the values of this province, he said.

The discussion of such a ban is having a negative impact on Quebec's economy, he said, scaring away foreign investment. He predicts highly mobile doctors and other professionals directly affected would leave the province.

"Quebec has become the laughingstock of North America," Hiess said.

He said he's astonished that Democratic Institutions Minister Bernard Drainville, a former Radio-Canada journalist, is appealing to the worst instincts of people, to the "lowest common denominator" by fanning fear of religious minorities, especially among those living outside Montreal, where Muslims, Jews and Sikhs are few.

Alex Werzberger, head of the Coalition of Chassidic Communities of Outremont, agreed that, if the charter is adopted, it could open the way to further restrictions. "This is going to touch each and every one of us in ways we cannot even think of," he said.

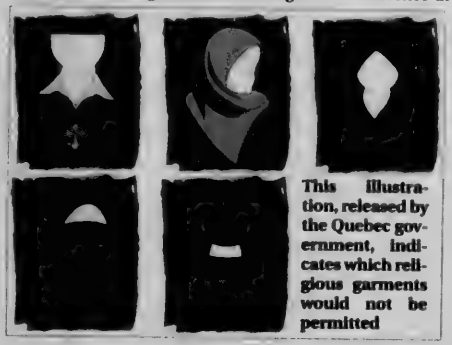
He worries, for example, that kosher meals might not be available in hospitals, or if kosher food would even be allowed to be brought in from the outside.

He's concerned that too much discretion will be in the hands of bureaucrats to draw the line between the religious and the secular.

"[Former prime minister] Pierre Trudeau said the government has no business in the bedrooms of the nation. Well, it has no business meddling in the souls or consciences of the nation, either."

Whether or not the charter is passed, Werzberger said the message the government is sending is, "We do not want any religious people showing their religion in public in Quebec." It's a chilling reminder to him of the Spanish Inquisition, when Jews were forced to convert or go underground.

"Why isn't the government taking the $2 million it's going to spend on promoting the charter and using it instead to educate people about minorities?" Werzberger asked.



This illustration, released by the Quebec government, indicates which religious garments would not be permitted

Ira Robinson, a Judaic studies professor at Concordia University specializing in Canadian Jewish studies, is fearful the charter will set the tone for who is and who is not a full-fledged member of Quebec society.

"This is an attempt to impose on an entire society a hegemonic definition of what is acceptable and what is not... This is a responsible government saying, 'We are in Quebec and this is how we define ourselves. People who do not wish to conform will not have the full privileges of our society,'" said Robinson, who wears a kippah at all times.

Robinson is concerned that when people see him on the street with his kippah, they will think, "If he wanted a responsible position, he would change, and that it is some kind of expression of dissent."

Mayors Anthony Housefather of Côte St. Luc and William Steinberg of Hampstead, which have predominantly Jewish populations, are among the mayors of 15 de-merged municipalities on the island of Montreal who, on Sept. 11, adopted a resolution opposing the charter, saying it denies the multicultural reality of the city.

"We will oppose the adoption of the charter through all political means and, in the event it is adopted, we would certainly apply for the exemption [foreseen in the proposed law]," Housefather said.

"The charter is an attempt by the PQ government to divert attention from their failure to handle the urgent issues of the day – the economy, infrastructure, education, health, pension plans – and to sow division."

In unveiling the charter, the government said the goal is to "set clear rules for everyone. Since 2006, a number of high-profile religious accommodation cases have given rise to a profound discomfort in Quebec. To maintain social peace and promote harmony, we must prevent tensions from growing... We will be best served by a state that treats everyone the same."

Among the proscribed headwear are kippot. However, small items of jewelry would be permitted.

Drainville explained at his Sept. 10 press conference at the National Assembly that the government wants "to allow people to wear discreet signs... We don't see any problem with someone wearing a little ring or little earrings showing a little cross or Star of David...

"If there is a problem eventually on the size of the things, people will just sit down and agree... We think these issues can be resolved by common sense and discussion... in good faith, and I think that people will generally agree to replace the symbol by something [and], if the problem is that it's too big, by something smaller."

The ban on "overt and conspicuous" religious attire would apply to all employees of ministries and government organizations, provincial and municipal; judges, police officers, prosecutors and correctional agents; staff of the Centres de la petite enfance (CPEs) and subsidized private daycares, public school boards, cegeps and universities, and public health care and social services.

Cegeps, universities, health and social service institutions, and municipalities could opt out of the charter for a renewable, five-year period.

The five-pronged plan also calls for amending the Quebec rights charter to include rules on handling religious accommodation requests in light of the supremacy of state neutrality and gender equality, forbidding public employees to promote their religious beliefs on the job, requiring that faces be uncovered to receive government services, and having all ministries and governmental organizations implement a policy on neutrality and the management of religious accommodation.

Drainville stressed that "the idea of having a neutral state that is respectful of everyone, notwithstanding your personal convictions, is a very unifying idea... We need to say, and repeat and repeat, that the reason we want to do this is to give the same respect to everyone."

In Ontario, longtime MPP and former cabinet minister Monte Kwinter of the governing Liberal party tabled a motion Sept. 10 that calls on that province's legislature to oppose any bill to restrict or prohibit freedom of expression and religion in public places.

Kwinter, who is Jewish, said his aim wasn't to interfere with Quebec politics, but he believes that if the charter is adopted, it could have wider repercussions, such as an exodus of opponents to Ontario.

The motion is expected to be heard in the legislature Sept. 19, and he hopes it will receive all-party support.

HOLY BLOSSOM TEMPLE

Executive Director, Holy Blossom Temple

Our client, Holy Blossom Temple, a prominent North American Reform synagogue located in Toronto, is seeking an exceptional Executive Director to effectively manage the business of the Temple, lead the administrative staff, and work in collaboration with lay leadership and the Senior Rabbi to drive and realize the vision of the organization. Reporting to the volunteer President, this is a rare and exciting opportunity for an outstanding operations leader. He/she will bring 10 to 15+ years of management experience including senior operational, financial, systems, and administrative leadership gained from working with multifaceted, client service focused organizations within the not-for-profit, public and/or private sectors. A trusted advisor and strategic collaborator, the Executive Director will have a proven track record as an authentic leader and relationship builder who is able to work effectively with and engage multiple stakeholders.

Advising the President, the Board of Directors and its committees, the Executive Director will provide leadership and be accountable for the development and implementation of the strategic plan, ensuring the vision for the future of Holy Blossom is clearly communicated to the congregation. Overseeing a multi-million dollar budget, the Executive Director will leverage social media, drive the adoption of new technologies, implement data analytics tools to ensure quality measurement and reporting, and enhance the Temple's ability to interact with its congregation in a meaningful way. The Executive Director will energize congregational volunteer engagement, support next generation member growth, and oversee the Temple's fundraising activities, including the ongoing physical Renewal Project capital campaign, annual fundraising, and planned giving.

A warm, collaborative, and values driven leader, the Executive Director will build a collegial, effective, and trusting working relationship with the Senior Rabbi, the professional staff, the President, the Board of Directors, and the lay leadership of the Temple, establishing partnerships that allow for the successful execution and clear delegation of responsibilities on multiple Holy Blossom initiatives. A skilled project manager, the Executive Director will manage the Temple budget in a manner that will strengthen financial sustainability allowing for Holy Blossom to achieve its full potential. An engaging and invigorating presence, the Executive Director will guide a committed administrative team, fostering a culture of engagement and high morale, while enthusiastically supporting the priorities of Holy Blossom.

Forward thinking and strategic, he/she is a skilled communicator able to maximize resources and leverage technology to extend an organization's reach and effectively engage a broader community. A diligent and agile executive, he/she is comfortable balancing administrative and operationally focused responsibilities, and is able to seamlessly transition from membership oversight and fundraising initiatives to the management and development of Temple assets. The Executive Director will be a key facilitator of Holy Blossom's physical, educational, and spiritual renewal and help guide the Temple's strategic growth for many years to come.

Dialysis doesn't cure kidney disease or make kidneys well again, and it doesn't fully replace kidney function.

During his first dialysis treatment, Arie became nauseous, couldn't hear and fainted a couple of times. Since then, it has gotten better. But the process still leaves him exhausted, extremely hungry and usually with a bad headache. He goes through dialysis twice a week for three hours at a time.

"It is emotionally hard, too. He has seen his mom live this life," Joy said.

"I can't imagine what it must be like for him to look down the road and say 'This is what my life will be like and to have his life expectancy shortened tremendously.' And to look at a new son and think those things."

A day before Benjamin's brit milah, Arie experienced a ruptured cyst, which can happen with his disease.

A rupture leaves him in extreme pain and sometimes incapacitated for a week. Fortunately, this time, the pain subsided somewhat, and he was able to be part of the special occasion.

It can all be difficult to balance.

Arie tries to work as much as possible – he owns a security business – while fitting in dialysis, medical appointments and finding time to be with his wife and baby.

This summer, the family rented a cottage for a week, and he had to visit the local hospital for dialysis. He couldn't swim in the lake for fear of infection at his access site. He will never be able to go anywhere without being able to get dialysis, making travel out of Ontario difficult and very expensive.

"We would have never thought we'd be here at this point in our lives. Maybe in 20 to 30 years, but not now," Joy said.

"Our lives look very different than most people our age. But we will keep sharing our story and hope someone, somewhere will work out.

"We are so incredibly touched by the people who have come forward. It is amazing that people would take that step."

Montreal chooses architects for Mordechai Richler gazebo

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

The gazebo on Mount Royal is to become the Pavillon Mordecai-Richler, but when is unclear.

MONTREAL — Two years after the project was announced, architects have been chosen by the City of Montreal to renovate the gazebo on the eastern slope of Mount Royal that is to be named for the late Mordecai Richler.

In June 2011, on the eve of the 10th anniversary of the writer's death, the administration of then-mayor Gérald Tremblay promised to pay tribute to Richler by restoring the more than 80-year-old structure and naming it for him.

The project was to be completed by the summer of 2012. To this day no work has been done on the gazebo, which has continued to deteriorate.

It received no publicity at the time, but on Aug. 21 the city's executive committee approved the bid by the architectural firm of Beaupré Michaud et Associés to draw up plans for "Pavillon Mordecai-Richler."

The firm was the only tender, and the executive committee approved a maximum budget of $57,753.37, taxes included, for its work.

This information only came to light after The CJN asked councillor Marvin Rotrand, the prime mover behind the campaign to have the city honour Richler by naming a public place after him, what progress, if any, had been made on the project.

No time frame for the submission of the architectural plans was made known.

The decision to honour Richler this way was made after months of public discussion on whether and how his native city should officially remember him. The gazebo was chosen by the city's executive committee because of its proximity to the neighbourhood Richler grew up in and made famous in his novels.

Special to The CJN

Few students understand the importance of Israel advocacy like Leon Martynenko does.

Martynenko, originally from Ukraine, lived in Israel from 1996 to 2007 and served in the Israel Defence Forces before moving to Canada with his parents and enrolling at the University of Toronto's Mississauga campus.

These circumstances make him a little older than most of his peers, and also far more knowledgeable about the political situation in the Middle East.

While his mandatory army service is over, his peers are still getting called up regularly to defend Israel on its front lines.

So he sees it not only as desirable that he speak up on campus on behalf of Israel, but as a moral obligation.

The need for advocacy became achingly clear back in 2009, during the conflict in Gaza.

"It was horrible what was going on in school," he recalled.

Meeting StandWithUs Canada's executive director Meryle Kates in the fall of 2012 convinced Martynenko to work with the organization, sharing the truth about Israel on his own campus and beyond.

"They provide a lot of material and quality training... I joined them from the very beginning," said Martynenko.

Kates recalled: "Leon was one of the first students that I identified by a chance lucky meeting."

Leon Martynenko

Last fall, StandWithUs Canada was a brand-new offshoot of a 12-year-old organization started in the United States, which now has 17 chapters worldwide.

Martynenko was a perfect fit, Kates said.

"[He was] really committed to standing for and defending Israel on campus, and had absolutely no way to do it on his own," she said.

The Mississauga campus had very few Jewish students, Kates added, and those who were there were felt "under assault every day by the kind of anti-Israel rhetoric that's allowed to run rampant."

The situation in Mississauga parallels that at York University and other universities across Canada, Martynenko said.

"There is a big population of students who are... trying to denounce Israel at any opportunity."

He added that most university-aged students simply don't feel comfortable standing up to powerful anti-Israel factions such as Students Against Israeli Apartheid (SAIA).

They're usually young and insecure about speaking with, or single-handedly trying to counter, these groups.

"It's hard to speak against these people," Martynenko said.

Students also lack the knowledge to counter statements they may have already heard on campus and in the media.

StandWithUs Canada offers the security of a group setting – with tables and information boards for events – along with the winning weapon of knowledge – historical and political facts that answer the vocal naysayers' claims.

"They provided pamphlets and other information so students can... educate other students, those who have no idea what Israel is," Martynenko said.

Kates said there's no other organization that offers students the kind of support that StandWithUs does.

"[We have a] focused mandate to simply empower students with the education and resource materials... to be able to speak about Israel in a way that will create positive impressions about the country," she said.

Although he graduated with a double major in economics and the history of religion, with a dual concentration in Judaism and Islam, Martynenko plans to take additional courses to prepare for a career in project management and business analysis.

Despite a busy schedule, Martynenko insisted he won't drop the StandWithUs baton he's carried for nearly a year.

"I started this on my campus, I cannot just walk away and drop responsibility on someone else. I will show up, and I will help them."

The Canadian Jewish community must continue supporting StandWithUs Canada while it expands its operations onto more campuses, including U of T's downtown campus, Ryerson University, York and further afield, Martynenko said.

Though university administrators may personally support Israel, they "will not speak out against specific... phenomena on campus."

Marathon puts focus on glaucoma

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Mark Shaffer, a local physician, is taking part in a marathon next month to raise the profile of a disease that has affected his family for years.

He's running for the Glaucoma Research Society of Canada in the Scotiabank Waterfront Charity Challenge – comprising a half marathon, a 5-km run or a 5-km walk – taking place Oct. 20.

An eye disease that can lead to blindness, glaucoma affects 400,000 people in Canada, with an estimated another 400,000 as yet undiagnosed.

Shaffer's son, Gabriel, now 40, who is married with two children, was born with no central vision in his right eye, due to an infection his mother contracted while pregnant.

"If he is looking at a bullseye, he only sees the periphery," Shaffer said.

About 12 years ago, Gabriel's "good eye became another bad eye" when he began feeling some discomfort from pressure within his eye.

"He was diagnosed with glaucoma and since then has continued to take drops and has had two surgeries. He requires exceedingly careful and timely follow-up for the remainder of his life with the hope that he maintains the vision that he has."

Shaffer became involved in the society about seven years ago, he said, because it's a small group, and he wanted to get the word out.

"Glaucoma is one of the leading causes of blindness if it goes untreated."

The mission of the group, he said, is to raise funds for research.

A "minimal runner," Shaffer is taking part in the marathon to raise money and raise awareness. "We have to send out a message, and even my grandchildren are involved. This past summer they ran a lemonade stand in front of their house to raise funds for the society."

For information on the run, visit torontowaterfrontmarathon.com.

CAMP GETS NEW SHUL: Campers and staff at Camp Moshava enjoyed a new synagogue this summer, thanks to the generosity of Julia and Henry Koschitzky, who have strong ties to the camp. The only co-ed Orthodox Zionist camp in Canada, Moshava was started more than 50 years ago. A formal dedication took place on visitors' day, July 21, with a performance by the camp choir and a dessert reception.

Where's the beef?

Test-tube meat raises a host of halachic issues

We at the Kashruth Council of Canada (COR) – Canada's largest kosher certifier – read with great interest the recent news that scientists at Maastricht University in the Netherlands have created meat in a laboratory derived from a cow's muscle tissue.

We are most excited by this development and see considerable potential, including a possible tool to combat hunger in developing nations and an alternative staple that could drive down the cost of food – although the price tag on the initial "test-tube burger" was an astounding $325,000.

And you thought kosher meat was expensive!

This new discovery raises a few interesting halachic issues. Since the original meat cells are extracted from an animal, the animal would have to be a kosher one, and killed in accordance with Jewish law (shchitah). One might argue that the originating cells are used in a minimal quantity – a ratio of at least 60 to 1 – and therefore the non-kosher component is nullified due to the halachic principal of batel b'shishim (nullification). However, this argument would likely not stand up because of an exception to this principle of batel b'shishim called davar hama'amid, namely, when the ingredient in question is essential to the transformation process it cannot be nullified, no matter how infinitesimal the amount used.

Richard Rabkin

Another factor to consider is that if the originating animal tissues are derived from a live animal, it could be a violation of the prohibition of basar min hachai, taking a piece of meat from an animal that is still living.

So if the originating cells are extracted from an animal that has been killed in accordance with Jewish law, the kosher test-tube burger may indeed by feasible. Now for the most important question: the cheeseburger.

It could be argued that the test-tube meat should have the same halachic status as kosher beef gelatin. Gelatin is a translucent substance derived from the collagen of animal byproducts, mainly bones and hides, that is used as a gelling agent. The animal bones and hides are broken down into gelatin via an intense chemical process. The great halachic scholar of the previous generation, the late Rabbi Moshe Feinstein, among others, was of the opinion that kosher beef gelatin obtains a pareve status because of the intense chemical process that the product undergoes. This ruling is followed by the Kashruth Council, as well as the other major kosher certifiers.

The rationale for kosher beef gelatin could extend to our case, and thus the test-tube meat may well be considered pareve.

But before we fire up our barbecues for kosher cheeseburgers, there is one more factor to consider, and that's the halachic principle of ma'arit ayin. Ma'arit ayin means "appearance to the eye" and is a rabbinic dictum that prevents certain actions if an onlooker would assume the person is engaged in a forbidden activity. Eating milk and meat together is prohibited by the Torah, so would a test-tube cheeseburger contravene ma'arit ayin?

The considerations concerning ma'arit ayin are complex, but in general if a simulated food product is already well known, such as margarine or non-dairy creamer, or the taste and texture of the simulated product differs from the original, ma'arit ayin may not apply.

Alternatively, a distinction of some sort, a heker, could be placed on the product packaging or at the restaurant so that consumers would know that the product was not real meat – for example, branding the product as the "Maastricht Meatless Burger."

Of course, these are only preliminary considerations, and assuming that one day Maastricht University can bring down the $325,000-per-burger cost to something a little bit more, well, manageable, when the time comes, the Kashruth Council's rabbis will study the issue in depth and consult with our colleagues in the kashrut industry and develop an official position.

In the meantime, maybe the scientists should start working on test-tube herring – wouldn't that be something?

Richard Rabkin is director of marketing at the Kashruth Council of Canada.

Bialik school opens new branch in Vaughan

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

The blowing of the shofar heralded the Sept. 11 grand opening of Bialik Hebrew Day School's Ben and Edith Himel Education Centre at the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan.

Phase 1, which is now complete, is home to one class each of junior kindergarten, senior kindergarten and Grade 1. This space can accommodate the inaugural Grade 1 class until Grade 4.

A $12-million campaign is currently underway for phases 2 and 3 of the building to be erected concurrently.

Phase 2 needs to be ready to accommodate the incoming Grade 1 class through grades 5 to 8 and will include an art room, science lab, lunch room, library and gym. Phase 3 is designed to expand the school to two classes at each grade level.

Shana Harris, Bialik's head of school, said at the opening that 52 years ago, a group of labour Zionists "made the bold decision to start a school. It is through their foresight that this small group contributed to Jewish continuity.

"For the past 27 years or so, the dream has been to open a second branch. Now, another small group with some vision has made the dream a reality. We are now able to give children in the northern GTA roots [in the Jewish community]."

Ted Sokolsky, president and CEO of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, said the new branch was made possible "because of leaders who had a vision and who believed in the future."

The opening also included a performance by the Bialik Hebrew Day School choir and a ribbon-cutting ceremony.

FIGHTING HATE

Leaders from across the political spectrum joined the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies (FSWC) at a Rosh Hashanah reception at Queen's Park on Sept. 10 to toast the new year. The event also included a ribbon-cutting ceremony to launch the FSWC's newest initiative, Tour4Humanity (T4H), a "mobile tolerance training centre," designed to bring the organization's programming to communities across the province. From left, Ontario PC Leader Tim Hudak, FSWC president and CEO Avi Benlolo, T4H donor Dorothy Shoichet, NDP Leader Andrea Horwath, Ontario Lt.-Gov. David Onley, T4H donor Tom Koffler and Ontario Premier Kathleen Wynne cut the ribbon to launch the initiative. [FSWC photo]

Lightning strikes twice at Tel Huqoq

Past Forward
Alex Gropper

Last year, I was one of the first to write about the spectacular discovery of a Late Roman/Early Byzantine synagogue at Huqoq in the upper Galilee, with an inscribed mosaic floor showing the biblical hero Samson.

This turned out to be one of the major archeological discoveries of 2012. Its excavator, Jodi Magness, was invited to give the keynote address at the Archaeological Institute of America's annual meeting.

My initial involvement with the Huqoq excavations came about thanks to Michael Chazan, the head of the University of Toronto's Archaeology Centre, who asked if I could help him raise funds to get U of T involved in this worthwhile endeavour. Fortunately I was able to do so, thanks to the generosity of a number of former students.

At the time, I thought that the Huqoq excavations would be an ideal vehicle to highlight the Jewish-Italian Friendship Project that I had helped to set up with both the Italian and Israeli consuls general in Toronto. It's a project that's meant to highlight and celebrate the close and harmonious relationship between our two communities. (It is also a friendship that was remembered recently with the 80th anniversary of the Christie Pits riots where Jews and Italians fought together against anti-Semitic thugs.)

This past summer brought another mosaic to light at Huqoq, once more showing Samson, this time carrying the gates of Gaza on his shoulders. The choice of Samson to be highlighted on the Huqoq mosaics is quite interesting, especially since he was looked upon as a proto-messianic figure, albeit a flawed one.

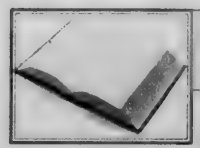
The Late Roman and Early Byzantine periods, to which the synagogue belongs, had just seen the establishment of Christianity as the official religion of the Roman Empire by the Emperor Constantine in the early fourth century CE. By the end of that century, the empire was permanently divided into two parts. The Western Empire did not survive, falling prey to barbarian invasions. The Eastern Empire, where the synagogue was located, would become the Greek-speaking Byzantine Empire.

By the beginning of the fifth century, the official persecution of Jews was starting. Hence, it would not be unusual for a synagogue built in this period to highlight a hero such as Samson, who had taken on the enemies of his people and prevailed against them.

Sukkot speaks to Jewish unity

Rabbi Yisroel Bernath



Rabbinic Reflections

Few holidays on the calendar speak of Jewish unity quite like the holiday of Sukkot. For seven days, we invite family and friends to dine with us in our makeshift home under the stars. Interspersed with eating and conversation, we sing Jewish melodies – slightly off-tune but with great gusto, while little bits of evergreen quietly drop into our chicken soup. Hey – it's tradition!

If you have a Sukkah in your yard or in an accessible location, don't be surprised if you get a random drop-in from a "Sukkah Hopper." In Jewish communities all over the world there is a true feeling of togetherness as we leave our comfortable homes and brave the elements in our temporary huts.

There is another element that symbolizes Jewish unity on Sukkot called the four species. The fulfilment of this mitzvah requires us to hold together either fruit or branches from four different species of trees – the date palm (lulav), the myrtle (hadas), the willow (cravat), and the citron (etrog). The midrash explains that the mitzvah of shaking the lulav and etrog (as the four species are usually called) symbolizes the intrinsic unity of the Jewish people.

These four species are noticeably different from one another. The etrog has both a pleasant taste and a pleasant fragrance. The fruit of the tree (date) from which the lulav is taken, has a pleasant taste, but no fragrance. The myrtle has a pleasant fragrance but no taste, and the willow has neither fragrance nor pleasant taste.

Taste symbolizes Torah study, because understanding Torah gives us a concrete pleasure, similar to the sensation of experiencing a pleasing flavor.

Smell symbolizes the fulfilment of mitzvot. Kabbalat ol – an unquestioned acceptance of the yoke of Heaven – is this quality that motivates us to fulfil the mitzvot. Since we often don't understand the reasons for the mitzvot, their observance may be less tangibly gratifying than Torah study is, in much the same way that smelling something is less palpably gratifying than tasting it.

Yet a deeper insight into the four kinds and its symbolism enables us to see each of the four species as representing a different type of individual.

The etrog represents a person who studies Torah and fulfils the mitzvot, the lulav represents one who studies Torah but does not perform mitzvot, the myrtle represents one who fulfils mitzvot but does not study Torah, and the willow represents a Jew who neither studies Torah nor observes mitzvot.

We bring these four unique species together and make one blessing over them in complete unity, showing that no matter where you come from or who you are – be it a scholar or a professional, rich or poor, happy or sad, a technophile or technophobic – you're a part of the Jewish People.

Which brings us back to the warm and inviting meal in the sukkah. Each person is integral to the Jewish People as each person in the sukkah helps to make every meal special and meaningful.

Chag Samayach!

New leadership in Israel: a work in progress

From the Reut Institute

Martin Ben Moreh

In the last few years, civil society in Israel has been developing at a rapid rate. This phenomenon really burst into the national consciousness in the summer of 2011 in the form of widespread social demonstrations, when some 600,000 people took to the streets – more than seven per cent of the population!

Young people want to influence the lives they lead and the country they live in. There has been an emergence of "authentic leadership" – a "serving elite" who want to create change on issues that affect their lives and have a strong desire to be actively involved in public discourse and the decision-making process.

Groups of young Israelis aged 22 to 35 who are interested in innovative change are springing up all over Israel. One example is the 200 Shachaf Communities that are in the midst of forming a national movement of young, socially active communities. These groups of young people from all sectors of Israeli society are leading social change in communities on Israel's socio-geographic periphery. Another example is the alumni of the youth movements who, after their initial experience in the movements and after finishing their army duty, have formed educational communities across Israel.

In Israel and all over the western world, we're seeing young people who are tired of, and disappointed by, the traditional political party system of the 20th century that allows them to vote every few years for a national party, usually on national issues. The new authentic leadership wants to be involved in ongoing decisions that affect their lives. They want to have a say in improving the quality of their life and want to make a real difference. This process is, of course, accelerated by the world of the Internet and the smartphone, where knowledge, news and new ideas are available literally 24/7.

There's a real need for a new social network that will provide a platform to develop this vibrant leadership. There's a need to form partnerships with clusters of leaders and to conduct a series of open meetings where various volunteers and professionals from different walks of life and various locations in Israel can participate in discussions on how to improve the quality of life on the local and national levels.

Part of the ongoing discussion will involve exploring the connections between local developing leadership and different fields of social innovation. The core platforms of everyday life that can empower citizens and help improve quality of life in their communities need to be explored. These platforms include schools, community centres, youth movements, parks and recreational spaces, hospitals and local clinics, and more. In addition new sources of community energy are emerging, from urban kibbutzim to regional start-ups and various grassroots movements that are active all over Israel. Another aspect of this project is to open the dialogue to young people living outside Israel who are facing similar dilemmas in their own lives.

The Reut Institute is reviewing ways to catalyze this new authentic leadership, one of which could be the establishment of a Reut "community hub" for organizations who see themselves as partners in our vision to create a prosperous and resilient network of communities across Israel.

Martin Ben Moreh is the Reut Institute's program director for Judaism, renewed Zionism and Israeli society.

After the High Holidays, now what?

From the Bimah

Rabbi Joe Kanofsky

If you want to run the Toronto Marathon, there are two ways to do it. The first way is to start off by getting some good running shoes, then stretching your muscles gently, and then going for a short walk or jog. You do this for a while until you get comfortable; going out a few times a week. Then, you build up your jog until it becomes a run of a couple kilometres. Then, over time you work up to 10 kilometres, then 20 kilometres. When you can do that a few times a week, you work your way up to 42 kilometres, and you're in pretty good shape to run a marathon.

The other way is significantly less time consuming. You simply register for the race, show up on the day of, and set off running as fast as you can. If you manage to complete the race without collapsing from pain or exhaustion, or both, you'll probably do some damage to your joints and muscles, and you'll feel it for weeks or even months to come. You'll likely promise yourself you'll never do that again, or at least not until next year at the very earliest.

Which one is the wiser course of training? I think we can agree that the first is much more prudent and productive.

Now think back to your experience over Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. It was quite a lot of time to spend in a synagogue! Did you feel that the prayers of the Yamim Nora'im were exhilarating, uplifting and invigorating? If so, you were probably in good "davening shape" beforehand. You probably "trained and stretched" well beforehand – you practised all year, at least a couple times a week, so you were spiritually fit and ready and able to put your soul and being into a real "service of the heart," coming close to the Holy One through the liturgy of the day.

If on the other hand you're sore from the experience, then something is wrong. You may well have strained or sprained your davening muscles! Each year, I see that some people are "out of shape" with davening to the extent that you wonder whether or not they will make it to the finish line, to Neilah. So what's the remedy? Begin training. The sooner the better!

There's no better place to start your training than Sukkot and Simchat Torah. The tfillot are sung heartily and enthusiastically by everyone, and the food is plentiful. The joyous spirit of Sukkot and Simchat Torah offer plenty of sensory delights: eating in a sukkah, singing Hallel, and taking the lulav, the four species bound together to represent the essential unity of the Jewish people. It's a joyous complement to balance the solemnity of the first 10 days of Tishrei.

Now is the time! Take active part in your community's celebration of Sukkot, and make sure to eat in a sukkah, or even build your own, and prepare yourself to dance on Simchat Torah. Before long, you'll find yourself much more spiritually fit!

U.S., Iranian presidents may meet at UN

The Times of Israel

In a dramatic warming of ties, U.S. President Barack Obama may meet at the UN later this month with the newly elected Iranian President Hasan Rouhani.

The possibility of a meeting on the sidelines of the UN General Assembly was reported Sunday night by Israel's Channel 10 news, and by various international news sources including Britain's Guardian newspaper. It would mark the first face-to-face talks between Iranian and American presidents since Iran's Islamic Revolution in 1979. There was no official confirmation of the reports.

Hasan Rouhani

Britain has confirmed that its foreign secretary, William Hague, will meet at the United Nations next week with his new Iranian counterpart, Mohammad Javad Zarif. Britain severed ties with Iran in 2011.

In an ABC TV interview Sunday, Obama said he had exchanged letters with Rouhani, but that the two had not spoken directly. The U.S. president said he believed Rouhani understood the potential for a diplomatic solution to his country's disputed nuclear program, but would not "suddenly make it easy."

"If you have both a credible threat of force, combined with a rigorous diplomatic effort…," Obama said, "you can strike a deal."

Israel's Channel 2 news reported Sunday night that Oman has recently been brokering indirect contacts between the United States and Iran, and that the U.S. might be prepared to consider an easing of some medical and other sanctions on Iran to help facilitate progress toward a diplomatic resolution over Iran's rogue nuclear program. In his comments Sunday, Obama warned Tehran that the new initiative to avert a western strike in Syria should not be interpreted as a lack of willingness in Washington to pursue a military solution, if necessary, to the ongoing Iranian nuclear standoff.

"I think what the Iranians understand is that the nuclear issue is a far larger issue for us than the chemical weapons issue, that the threat… against Israel that a nuclear Iran poses is much closer to our core interests," Obama said. "My suspicion is that the Iranians recognize they shouldn't draw a lesson that we haven't struck [the Bashar Assad regime] to think we won't strike Iran."

Conversely, Obama added, the Russian-brokered agreement that would see Syria hand over its sizable chemical weapons stockpile is an indication to Tehran that "there is the potential of resolving these issues diplomatically."

Zarif was quoted Sunday as saying that Iran sought "confidence-building measures" from the United States to help resolve the nuclear dispute, and that the U.S. needs to recognize that Iran now has advanced nuclear technology and knowhow.

Since taking office in early August, Rouhani has signalled a desire for warmed relations with the West, while also insisting that Iran intended to keep moving ahead with its nuclear program. In a speech to clerics last week, Rouhani said Iran "will not give up one iota" of its nuclear program.

The Channel 2 TV report said Israel broadly welcomed the U.S. argument that, as with Syria, diplomacy backed by a credible military threat might enable progress toward the negotiated resolution of the Iranian nuclear crisis. But at the same time, it said, there's concern in Jerusalem that because Obama had first threatened and then backed away from the use of force against Syria, the Iranians do not regard the United States as having a credible military option where they are concerned.

The key question, amid these new contacts between the U.S. and Iran, the report added, is how close to the bomb the Obama administration might allow the Iranians to get. Israel's position has been that Tehran's stockpiles of enriched uranium must be removed, and its capacity to progress toward nuclear weapons prevented.

The 68th General Assembly meeting of the United Nations runs from Sept. 24 to Oct. 4.

Chabad holds Yom Kippur services in flooded Boulder

JTA

BOULDER, Colo. — Some 300 worshipers attended Yom Kippur services in the lobby of the Chabad on Campus centre in flooded Boulder, Colo.

The lobby of the synagogue building is above the flood line, according to Chabad.org, which reported Sunday on the services.

Rabbi Yisroel Wilhem, co-director of Chabad of the University of Colorado, said many were unable to leave their homes to attend services, but others came because of the tragedy of the flash flooding that continues to batter the Boulder area.

Rabbi Yaakov Borenstein, co-director of the Chabad Jewish Center in Longmont, Colo., was forced to evacuate his home late last Thursday night, according to Chabad.org, booking the last room at the hotel in which he had booked a room to host the centre's Yom Kippur services.

Rain continued to fall Sunday in Colorado, with the death toll as high as six and nearly 500 people unaccounted for, according to reports.

Kerry, Netanyahu discuss peace talks

The arsenal would be destroyed "in the soonest and safest manner," according to the State Department. The agreement followed three days of talks in Geneva.

After his meeting with Kerry, Netanyahu said the world must ensure that radical regimes don't have weapons of mass destruction "because as we've learned once again in Syria, if rogue regimes have weapons of mass destruction, they will use them.

"The determination the international community shows regarding Syria will have a direct impact on the Syrian regime's patron, Iran. Iran must understand the consequences of its continual defiance of the international community by its pursuit toward nuclear weapons."

Kerry and Netanyahu also discussed the ongoing Israeli-Palestinian peace talks.

At a ceremony Sunday morning at Mount Herzl in Jerusalem marking the 40th anniversary of the Yom Kippur War, Netanyahu cautioned that "Israel must be prepared and ready to defend itself by itself against any threat. Today, this ability and this willingness are more important than ever."

On Saturday, Syria formally applied to join the Chemical Weapons Convention, the United Nations announced.

The document signed by Syria, however, stipulates that "the accession of the Syrian Arab Republic to the convention shall not in any sense imply recognition of Israel, and shall not entail entering into any relations with Israel in the matters governed by the provisions thereof."

Israel gets Moroccan etrogs

JNS.org

An etrog

Israel has received its first-ever shipment of etrogim from Morocco ahead of the Sukkot holiday, the Jerusalem Post reported.

The etrog, a fruit of the citron tree, is one of the Four Species – along with the lulav from the date palm tree, hadassim from the myrtle tree, and aravot from the willow tree – mentioned in the Torah as being connected with the holiday of Sukkot.

According to biblical scholars, the Moroccan etrog grows in the Atlas Mountains, a region that's the birthplace of the original etrog that is mentioned in the Bible.

The decision to import approximately 1,500 etrogs was due to a push from Israel's Sephardi community. Though they agreed to the etrog deal, Israel and Morocco do not share formal diplomatic relations. But the two countries did have brief economic and cultural ties during the 1990s, following the signing of the Oslo accords. Morocco was once home to more than 250,000 Jews, many of whom immigrated to Israel in the mid-20th century.

IOC head to leave trade group

Raphael Ahren
The Times of Israel

The newly elected president of the International Olympic Committee intends to resign from the presidency of an organization purported to support the anti-Israel boycott movement, The Times of Israel has learned.

Thomas Bach, a German sports functionary who was elected last week for an initial eight-year term at the helm of the IOC, is the chairman of Ghorfa, the Arab-German Chamber of Commerce and Industry. Founded in 1976, the organization is accused of helping companies make sure they avoid any trade with Israel. Since Bach's election last week in Buenos Aires, several Jewish groups have called on Bach to step down from his position at the trade group.

Bach also came under fire from Jewish groups for opposing a minute of silence for the Israeli victims of the Munich 1972 terror attack during last year's Olympic Games in London.

"He will resign as the president of Ghorfa," Christian Klaue, the head of media at the German Olympic Sports Confederation and Bach's spokesperson, told The Times of Israel. He also denied that Ghorfa had anything to do with the Arab world's boycott of Israel.

Bach had promised to step down from all his other positions bar one – the chairmanship of the supervisory board at Weinig AG, wood processing company based in his hometown of Tauberbischofsheim – if he was elected to head the IOC, Klaue said.

Bach himself has not publicly commented on his controversial presidency of Ghorfa. But in German media, Bach's membership in Ghorfa – and his close relationship with the Kuwaiti Sheikh Ahmad Al-Fahad Al-Ahmed Al-Sabah, who lobbied actively on the German's behalf – was described as problematic weeks ago. After he was elected, Jewish groups immediately called for Bach to resign his post at Ghorfa.

School programs let students study in Israel

Viva Sarah Press
Israel Correspondent

KARMIEL, Israel — High school semester abroad programs give students an inside view of another culture, offer a chance to meet lifelong friends and help them learn more about the world.

With dozens of similar programs to choose from, the new Dror Leadership High School (DLHS) is hoping Grade 10 and 11 students from Canada and the United States will choose a semester in northern Israel as their destination.

Sivan Bamberger and George Stevens

DLHS will kick off its first semester in January 2014. The program aims to give Jewish youth an opportunity to really experience Israel, learn about Jewish and Zionist issues, and help mould a new generation of community leaders.

"Jewish communities around the world are in need of young leaders who are strong in their Judaism, active in their communities and possess first-hand knowledge of Israel, both its beauty and its challenges," said Sivan Bamberger, director of the Dror program, based in the Galilee city of Karmiel.

Registration for the inaugural semester abroad is open until mid-October. George Stevens, the program's educational director and a former British Columbian with deep roots in the Vancouver Jewish community, said the ultimate goal is to host 25 students in the program.

"We expect five to 10 students for our first class. We want to have a high student to teacher ratio, as we want to give them the best experience they can have," Stevens said in an interview.

That ratio is unheard of in Israeli classrooms, where the Education Ministry allows 40 students per teacher.

Stevens stressed that the students will "take North American-style classes" while experiencing Israel on social, cultural and geographical levels.

"They'll learn Jewish history the Israeli way. First learn about it in the classroom and then, the next day, go see where it happened," he says.

DLHS has an agreement with the Adam Hevra Ve'Teva school in the town of Karmiel, just outside of Haifa, to operate an English-speaking, American class within the Israeli high school.

For decades it was a kibbutz-based high school program that brought North American teens to Israel for a semester. Bamberger raved about the program she attended some 15 years ago.

"The spirit of kibbutz – community, camaraderie, a safe space for everyone – really trickled down to us, the North American students," she said. "It was a very influential experience that gave me self-confidence, lifelong friendships and the skills to be a Jewish leader. Unfortunately, that program no longer exists, so we're building a new one in that spirit, but which is updated to reflect the realities of Israel in 2013."

Stevens said that throughout his years in Jewish education – among other posts, he served as program director at Or Shalom Religious School in Vancouver – he learned that "the best way to truly experience Israeli society is to live as a part of it and contribute something to it. This way you meet Israelis and understand the issues they face."

The Jewish educators behind the program chose the small city of Karmiel in order to keep the community spirit an option. "It's a great city and it's bigger than a kibbutz, more interesting, but it's very peaceful and quiet. In Karmiel, you can experience every walk of life in Israel," Stevens said.

As for parents worried that their children may not want to come back, the DLHS program is not meant as a push toward aliyah.

"We're not going to say, 'This is why you should make aliyah.' Sixteen years old is too young to think about aliyah, but they can think about Israel and what role they want it to play in their lives," he said. "We hope the students will develop a deep, lasting connection to Israel and a better understanding of what it means to be Jewish."

Trips inspire young Jewish Canadians

Monique Elliot
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When Mitch Goldenberg reached out to distant family living in Israel this summer, he said it was in an effort to build a stronger connection to his heritage and cultural identity.

Like many of his peers, young Canadian Jews are planning trips to Israel, whether through organizations such as Taglit Birthright or camps such as Canadian Young Judaea (CYJ).

Goldenberg spent the past year travelling Europe after graduating from Carleton University.

The Thornhill, Ont., native then decided to apply for a staff position on Biluim Israel's leadership program at CYJ, and, after touring concentration camps and memorials in Poland with a group of 17-year-olds, found himself with a free weekend in Israel and contacted distant family he vaguely knew about.

"I honestly think that growing up and going to university and going to Poland and having the education I have has led me to be interested in this stuff now," he said.

He especially connected with his second cousin, Tommy Ben Shaul, who invited Goldenberg to join him at a family lunch.

"It is special," Ben Shaul wrote via email. "Although I hadn't met him, we had a bond. I can't explain it, but I felt close to him, although I learned of his existence only a short time before I met him."

The pair, both 23, bonded by going out for drinks with friends, watching Seinfeld episodes, and trading life stories.

"It sort of seems surreal that we connected so well," Goldenberg said. "I decided to take advantage of an opportunity and it paid off, because now I know a lot more about my history."

Goldenberg, a journalism school graduate, also interviewed his father's cousin in an effort to hear his Holocaust stories and learn how his family came to settle in Canada.

Grade 12 student and Biluim participant Jonah Strub said his life experiences allowed him to connect to Israel in a different way. Strub, who had never before been outside of North America, said meeting relatives in Israel made him want to return.

"It really made me think about my future a little bit more, because I was always planning... on living in Toronto my entire life," he said.

"Going to Israel, it really made me feel a connection... to a different country that I've never really had before, so it really made me think that maybe I want to go to university in Israel for one year, maybe I want to live there when I'm older," he added.

"It made me think a little bit more about the different options that I could have in my future."

Looking back through the Open Window

Sarah Shapiro-Goldberg
Special to The CJN

In June 2011 my mother Fela Shapiro passed away. She was predeceased by my father, Kusiel Shapiro, and her sister, my beloved aunt, Elka Rubenstein.

Fela and Elka survived the Holocaust together, never separated even for a minute. I understood that our families were unique in that most of our parents' friends didn't have a single living relative. But we did. Our families shared everything. If we weren't actually living under the same cottage roof, we lived around the corner from each other. We shared holidays, family occasions and every summer at the cottage. So looking back through the window of summers past on Jubilee Road, here is a story about Fela and Elka, sisters like no other.

My parents and aunt and uncle purchased the cottage in 1955 for something like $3,000. That was when a worker could buy a small cottage not on the lake but close enough that you could yell to your mother to bring down something to eat. We were lucky to have had that quintessential Canadian experience of leaving the city on the last day of school not to return until Labour Day.

For many years we didn't have a phone at the cottage. It would have never occurred to me to speak to a friend during the summer. I was with my sister and my three cousins, my mother and aunt and we didn't need anyone else.

My dad worked in the city and my mother would call him every Tuesday evening. So Tuesdays, after dinner, we walked to Pete's Marina and General Store. The phone booth was covered in cobwebs, spiders spinning or dead, crazed moths swarming and sticky Popsicle wrappers – all things she could not tolerate for a second. So naturally she brought a pail of hot water, Mr. Clean and a shmatte to scour the booth. Of course you have to sterilize the booth before you make a five-minute call.

After speaking to my Dad and having ice cream, we went back to the lake, had one more swim and watched the sun slip away.

Fridays were something else all together. It was a high-energy day that took preparing for Shabbat to a whole new level. We were kicked out of the cottage right after breakfast so my mother and aunt could clean and then cook. After their morning coffee they took to their corners, ready to begin cleaning with a vengeance. They were pros and if we knew what was good for us, we would just get out of the way.

Chores for the kids were unheard of. Any mother who enlisted the help of her children to do anything related to housekeeping couldn't possibly be serious about clean. And that is why I never made my bed, washed a dish or boiled the kettle until I got married because it was clear that everything had to be just so. I got a total kick out of watching my mother and aunt in a mad cleaning frenzy, sweating in the humidity, relentless in their pursuit of clean.

Mid-morning on Fridays we waited for the sound that would transform the day to Erev Shabbat. Soon the Open Window Bakery truck would turn onto Jubilee Road, honking all the way down – backwards. The driver jumped out and flung open the back doors. The smell of the fresh baked challahs, buns and cakes made us dizzy. There were chocolate cup cakes filled with whipped cream, danishes and finally the legendary blueberry buns. These buns were packed with blueberries so fresh they would be dripping down your chin as you inhaled them off the racks. The Open Window Bakery truck was loved by Jewish families all around Lake Simcoe. Not only because it brought breads and cakes but also because it delivered us summertime Shabbat.

Late in the afternoon on Friday was bath time. This was a trick because the cottage had no bath or shower. We did have a large basin, several soup pots and a hot water faucet outside. One by one our mothers peeled off our bathing suits, stuck us in the basin and began soaping us down. The pots were used to rinse our hair. We dried off, put on our best Shabbat shorts and pop-tops and ran down to the end of the road to wait for the bus that would bring my dad.

Shabbat dinner was done in two shifts. The kids ate first and then we would be kicked out again. That's twice on Fridays. My mom and aunt then scrambled like synchronized curlers to clean up and set the table once again for the men. Remember, the kids never helped with anything.

We were spoiled by those long days of swimming, diving into cresting waves, digging for clay or floating on a raft. Inside the back door our names remain, faded by the seasons, marking how much we grew from year to year. They are a symbol of the cycle of summers that defined our childhood and shaped our lives.

Fela and Elka gave their families the gift of childhood innocence and the loving bonds that stood the test of time. Devotion to family was how they lived and the legacy they left for their five daughters and 18 grandchildren. Not bad for two sisters from Lodz who survived an inferno, came to Canada and built new lives. And what lives they had, together to the end and forever after.

Investigator uncovers financial wrongdoing

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

By the time Edward Nagel arrives at the crime scene, the perpetrator usually has done his or her best to wipe clean any traces of the incident.

Incriminating evidence? There's a good chance it's been disposed of and the lawbreaker has covered his tracks. Or at least he thinks he has.

Witnesses? That's for crime shows. Usually, you won't find anyone willing to testify, so putting together a case means rolling up your sleeves, opening the books and indulging in the painstaking and time-consuming "legwork" – make that paperwork – that can crack a case wide open.

Nagel, you see, wears no badge but he is an investigator with a CPA following his name. He's a gumshoe in a slick suit whose bailiwick is the grimy underworld inhabited by miscreants who pilfer the company cash box, sometimes to the tune of tens of thousands, even hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Nagel is a forensic accountant, a license designation that acknowledges his special skill in uncovering corporate fraud, misappropriation of funds and general wrongdoing that other accountants and corporate officers might overlook.

Edward Nagel is a forensic accountant

His profession is true to the real meaning of the word "forensic," which contrary to the impression repeated in numerous crime shows, does not necessarily entail bloodstained victims and walls riddled with bullet holes.

Forensic, in the context in which he operates, simply refers to something suitable for court, he said.

He has been called to testify as an expert witness, but that is an infrequent occurrence, if not entirely rare.

"When it comes to fraud, most of the cases tend to settle before they get to court," he explained.

When he is called onto a case, his task is to find out where the money went. And when he's done so, the cases are usually resolved internally.

Clients would rather get their money back and give the perpetrator the bum's rush out the door than attract unwanted publicity. Non-profits and for-profit corporations simply don't want exposure of the shortfalls in their internal mechanisms for preventing wrongdoing, Nagel, 41, said.

Nagel, a chartered professional accountant (CPA), has been working as a forensic accountant since 1998. He started at Arthur Andersen and left to work in a boutique firm. He started his own practice, nagel + associates, in October 2009.

The father of two youngsters in a Jewish day school, he's also on the executive committee and the board of Technion Canada, which supports the Haifa-based university.

As to his business, he said, "Most of the cases I'm involved with are fraud-related and they're mostly corporate fraud."

Typically, a CEO, CFO, board member or their legal counsel will bring him on board after concerns have been raised over financial irregularities.

They're worried one of the company's officers is finagling funds or altering financial statements to cover up a fraud, he said.

Small firms that employ a general manager often deal in cash and it can be easy for someone to "dabble in the books." Larger companies usually are subject to more complex schemes. It could be a case where a CFO was skimming money from the firm by setting up a fictitious vendor and writing cheques to them, creating a "ghost employee" and paying them, or padding expenses.

Another aspect of corporate crime occurs when management falsifies financial reporting to lower costs or inflate revenues. If the employee's compensation includes a bonus, they can personally profit from that sort of misdeed, he said.

Sometimes the fraud is intentional. Other times, the perp stumbles into it. It can start with something as apparently innocuous as padding expenses like restaurant bills and taxi receipts.

The employee may stumble into a loophole in a corporation's internal controls and then seek to exploit it, he said.

But, there are telltale signs that suggest corporate gonifs fit a profile. That person could be a long-term employee who rarely takes vacations, never asks for help on the job, gets angry when people do help, works late and on weekends, lives beyond his means and has an addiction, whether to gambling, alcohol or drugs.

People might steal thinking it's a temporary thing – they'll replace the money in short order. Others resent the success of colleagues and feel they should be the one with the expensive home or car.

On one occasion he cited, the search of a corporate officer's computer revealed a document that he created and then converted into a fake invoice to bill the company. The employee was terminated after he returned the $200,000 he had taken, Nagel said.

In another case – one he wasn't involved in – a long-serving Hamilton city employee stole more than $1 million over nine years. It happened despite internal cash-handling protocols. Commenting on the case, Nagel said a 2012 report found that worldwide, average occupational fraud lasts about 18 months before being uncovered, and that 20 per cent of all private and public workplace fraud exceeded $1 million.

It's estimated that companies lose as much as five per cent of their revenues to fraud, he added.

Cracking a case requires an intense attention to detail. That can mean searching a computer for incriminating data, checking payroll registers, comparing an employee's overtime claims to his schedule or even his security pass, he said.

"It's a lot of roll-your-sleeves up, looking for trends, anomalous transactions that occur at year end or at the end of a quarter" when bonuses are calculated, he said.

Kind of dry stuff – not even an overnight stakeout drinking lukewarm coffee to speak of.

Still, solving a case or setting up a system to prevent further thefts is gratifying.

"There's satisfaction in putting together the story, to be able to substantiate the allegations," Nagel said.

Book reads like a Chinese Game of Thrones

Joseph Serge
Arts Editor

River of Stars
Guy Gavriel Kay
Viking

In his last book, Under Heaven, Canadian award-winning novelist Guy Gavriel Kay created a historical fantasy novel set in China's Tang Dynasty.

In River of Stars, released last spring, Kay returned to the same world some four centuries later.

It's not quite a sequel, although events of the first book are occasionally referenced. In this one, the once powerful Kitai Empire is now divided, both externally and internally.

The empire is now subjugated to its northern rival, the Xialou Empire, which takes yearly tribute from Kitai. Internally, the court is divided by bitter factions that circle their Emperor, willing to do anything to curry favour, including starting what would surely be a disastrous war with the north.

Kitai also is bitter over the loss of what it calls the 14 prefectures, areas rightfully theirs that have been controlled by the Xialou for 200 years.

Into this ficticious world set in the decadent 12th Dynasty, Kay creates two strong, powerful characters destined, inevitably, to meet up with each other and change the course of Kitai's history.

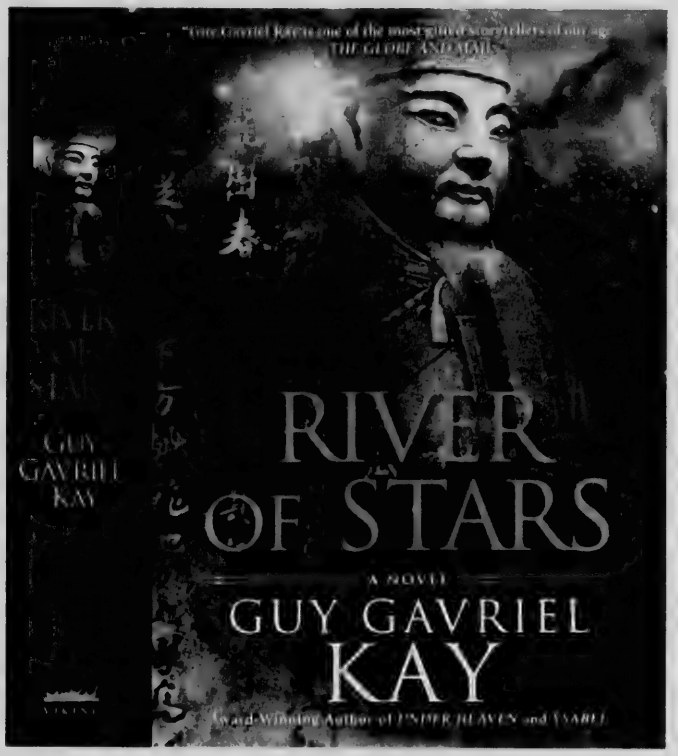
In the first pages, we are introduced to the young Ren Daiyan. The second son of a records clerk, he pretty much has no chance for fame and fortune, but, large for his age and confident, he is determined to grow up to be one of the greatest men of his time, destined to restore glory to a diminished world.

His prowess with a bow is not undetected, and as a teenager, he is selected to join the sub-prefect's bodyguard team on a journey to a neighbouring town. It's an important mission, one that his parents see as an opportunity for him to bring honour to his family.

This will be Daiyan's moment. The trip leads to a fateful ambush in which Daiyan kills seven men with seven arrows in an instant. He decides there and then not to return to his hometown, but escapes into the forests the bandits came from, thus beginning his new journey.

Lin Shan is 17 when we first meet her. She is the only daughter of Lin Kuo, a respected court gentlemen. She is on her way with her father to visit the renowned Xi Wengao, a former prime minster, during the empire's illustrious Peony Festival. She is tall for a woman and can read the classics and the poets. Her father has educated her in many disciplines – she has a good writing hand and can sing and write songs in the new, modern style. Her father even trained her in archery. None of this is proper for a girl.

Shan is a fiercely independent woman, something unheard of in that time and place, when women bound their feet in subservience to men. She is adamant that she will not live life defined or controlled by what others think or say. She will not live the life others have chosen for her.



"One Guy Gavriel Kay is one of the most gifted storytellers of our age"
THE GLOBE AND MAIL
GUY GAVRIEL KAY
RIVER OF STARS
A NOVEL
GUY GAVRIEL KAY
Award-Winning Author of UNDER HEAVEN and TIGANA
VIKING

Time passes quickly. Daiyan becomes an outlaw, one about whom legends will be told for centuries. His strategy and skills are renowned and soon he is courted by a court official to join his guard, where he then rises to the role of a commander in the Emperor's army.

Shan, meanwhile, marries Qi Wai, a marriage her father has sought and approved of. At the time, he is a student of archeology, but, more importantly, he belongs to the exclusive imperial clan that offers Shan luxuries, privilege and servants.

"A woman marrying into the clan lives a different life. And it can be a good life, depending on the woman, on her husband, on the will of heaven," Kay writes. At the same time, it isn't always desirable, because marrying into the imperial clan means living a sequestered life, shaped by ceremony and regulation.

As part of the imperial clan, Shan gets the opportunity to meet the Emperor himself, and has frank, bold discussions with him, persuading him to release her favourite poet who has fallen into disfavour and been exiled.

Disfavour and falling from grace form a big part of the middle game of this novel, which can be likened into a form of Chinese Game of Thrones. Politics and court intrigue play a major part.

The Kital Empire is a shadow of its former self. It has just suffered a crushing military defeat at the hands of the neighbouring Kisliks, a tribal faction, primarily as a result of incompetence. (The general forgot to take siege weapons with his invading army.) Blame is thrown around and ministers are exiled or killed. It is said that in Kitai, people rise and fall. When you fall in Kitai, you fall a long way.

The Emperor himself spends most of his time in his wonderful garden and is mostly disinterested in the burdens of government. The garden is a monument to the empire itself, vast with man-made hills, lakes and mountains. He is unaware of just how many common people have died to build this luxury.

Within his court, two rivals, Hang Deijin and Kai Zhen, are vying for power. They will not stop at anything to further their own careers. Zhen's wife, a Lady Macbeth-like character, plots an elaborate scheme to kill Shan, and this is where Daiyan's life and Shan's intersect.

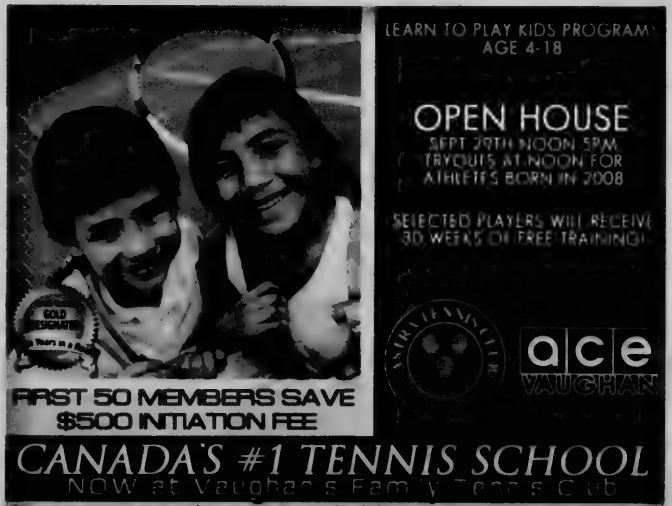
If the second part of the book gets somewhat bogged down by politics and intrigue, the patient reader is rewarded toward the end as things march headlong to a dramatic climax.

A new emerging tribe from the Koreini Peninsula, the Altai, is ascending and threatens the Kitai city of Hanjin. The Kitai, not accustomed to war, find themselves defending their city against the vastly superior barbarian hordes. Into this, Daiyan, now marked by prophecy, is a messianic figure called to change the tide and protect the empire.

There is very little fantasy or supernatural in this book, less than in Under Heaven and far less than his award-winninng Yisobel. There are many references to ghosts (which played a key role in the previous book) and a dramatic encounter with a Daiji, a half-woman, half-wolf seductress. But River of Stars is still full of Kay's other trademarks, strong, powerful characters, artfully created worlds, and delightful, poetic prose.

Ultimately, this is a novel about loyalty and betrayal. Some would betray their country for profit, others would sacrifice their lives for their Emperor.

Although there are some slow, digressive moments, particularly in the middle of this 600-page novel, fans of Kay will once again be delighted with it.



Filmmaker examines humour of Jewish comics

Jordan Adler
Special to The CJN

When Toronto filmmaker Alan Zweig was a child, his parents told him that Jews were outsiders and that was the way of the world.

However, when he watched The Ed Sullivan Show, he noticed that frequently the comics appearing on that program were Jewish. Zweig wanted to know why Jews were the kings of stand-up comedy in a society unkind to their faith.

"That was a huge paradox," Zweig said in an interview. "If they hate us, why do they think we're so hilarious? Why are we dominating this field? I wondered this my whole life."

Zweig explores these questions with the help of more than a dozen celebrated Jewish comics in his new documentary, When Jews Were Funny, which just screened at this year's Toronto International Film Festival.

In the film, Zweig sits down to interview several Jewish comics of today (notably Judy Gold, Howie Mandel and Marc Maron) and yesterday (like Shelley Berman and Shecky Greene), searching for answers.

He wants to know what made Jews such a potent comic force during his youth, and if that same vitality exists today.

In When Jews Were Funny, the older comics explain that up until the 1970s, it was not "in" to tell Jewish jokes. As strangers in a strange land, they had to adapt to the audience's needs and assimilate their culture.

Comedy was a tool for Jews to express their powerlessness and intelligence, Yuk Yuk's founder Mark Breslin says in the film. The alienation of the Jewish experience could spawn jokes where cynicism and sarcasm reeled in big laughs.

When Rodney Dangerfield remarked that he got "no respect," there was a truth behind it; however, it is also telling that those words were part of his famous shtick.

Zweig uses the subjects of his films as a way to explore his own dilemmas and problems. When Jews Were Funny explores the director's conflicted relationship with his faith, since he says comedy is what he loved most about growing up as a Jew.

Alan Zweig (left) with comedian Andy Kindler

Judaism did not appeal to Zweig much as a child, and he moved away from this heritage as an adult. "I felt coerced by my father [to be a devout Jew]. I don't blame him. I went to Hebrew school four days a week, two hours after school, and then I went to Jewish summer camp," he says.

"But it's not like I don't connect to it. If I'm at my sister's seder or if it's Chanukkah and I bring my daughter and they light the candles, those tunes… that's all in my head. I still have a feeling for it. Being around Jews, the Jewish attitude toward life, the way Jews talk – what others might consider negativity, the world-weary withering sarcasm – I love all that."

He also recalls the influence his parents had on his sense of humour. He says he loved watching his father's favourite comics, Alan King and Buddy Hackett, perform.

Comedy was also a shared pride between Zweig and his mother. "My mother is very old-fashioned compared to my father. My mother and I didn't share much of the same taste in anything," Zweig says. "But somebody told me that 'He had a hat' joke and I was like, 'Thank you. I'm going to tell that joke to my mother.'

"The next time I was home, I told my mother that joke. She laughed exactly like I hoped she would and it's one of my favourite memories of my mother."

Zweig had a wish list of around 40 Jewish comics he wanted to interview for the film, such as Jerry Seinfeld, Jon Stewart and Sarah Silverman. His top choice was Mel Brooks, whom he cites as "the reason I knew there was such a thing as Jewish humour."

Although many current stars were unavailable, he says it was still a joy to meet some of his heroes. "Whoever thought they would meet Shecky Greene? I was completely starstruck by [him]," he says. "It was just fun to hang out with Jews and talk about being Jewish."

The doc is also Zweig's third film to premiere at TIFF, and his first in 24 years. In 1989, he premiered a fiction short called Stealing Images, which won the festival's Best Canadian Short Film award.

HBO doc on Marty Glickman

Joe Winkler
JTA

In 1936, despite calls for a boycott of the Olympics in Nazi-controlled Germany, 18-year-old Jewish track phenom Marty Glickman wanted to show Hitler that Jews could compete.

The Brooklyn native had made the U.S. team and was slated to run the 400-metre relay race, but was pulled along with the other Jewish team member, Sam Stoller, a day before the race.

American officials claimed the decision stemmed not from considerations of religion but were made for athletic reasons. U.S. coaches claimed to believe the Germany was hiding its best sprinters for the 400-metre relay and said they needed their top runners to compete.

It would be more than a half-century before Glickman received a formal apology for the slight.

The story of how the man once known as the "Flatbush Flash" went from hometown hero to media sensation, then to legendary and beloved broadcaster, is the subject of the HBO documentary Glickman. Directed by James Freedman, the film is now airing on HBO Canada.

It showcases the late Glickman's magnetism, first through his ascendancy as a competitor, then as a transformative broadcaster who brought a populist appeal to his reporting.

As one of the first regular broadcasters of basketball games, Glickman would watch tapes endlessly until he came up with the jargon now widely used to describe the game. Lane, top of the circle, the wing, the key, the elbow and, most famously, swish — they're all Glickman coinages.

Glickman also took immense pride in his Judaism. At a time when many Jews changed their names for career reasons, Glickman refused.

"Glickman was a superhero to many children, especially the Jewish children," said Jerry Stiller, speaking for a generation who grew up listening to Glickman's broadcasts.

Glickman retired from broadcasting in 1992 and was later inducted into the Basketball Hall of Fame, the Jewish Sports Hall of Fame, the Broadcasters Hall of Fame and finally the New York Hall of Fame for his work.

Glickman died in 2001 from complications following heart surgery. He was 83.

Podcast star brings standup show to Toronto

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Marc Maron has done it all – television, standup, and even podcasting.

But this year brought Maron to the small screen in a new format – his own television series, called Maron, in which the American comedian portrays a fictionalized version of himself in a single-camera format, à la Larry David's Curb your Enthusiasm or Louis C.K.'s Louie.

Maron, who will be taking his brutally honest performance to Toronto for two nights as part of the Just for Laughs Festival, said the opportunity for a show of this kind came at a time when he had given up on that goal.

"It was something I didn't think I'd be able to do," he said, "[but] the opportunity came and I took it."

He described the format as an evolution of the technology that has allowed comedians to feel comfortable playing comics on television.

"It's OK to not pretend to be a UPS driver now," he said, adding that his playing himself – even a fictionalized version – gives the show a sense of intimacy. "The world becomes your stage."

On the show, Maron tells an embellished personal story from a few years ago, when he was at a difficult point in his life.

"My career wasn't going anywhere, I was broke, and I had gone through a second divorce," he said. "I knew people were doing podcasts, so I committed to a schedule and let the show evolve."

And evolve it did. These days, the real-life podcast, WTF with Marc Maron, gets more than 2.5 million listeners a month.

Maron is a scripted show about an unscripted podcast show, with many of Maron's comedian friends stopping by for interviews – also playing fictionalized versions of themselves.

Audiences wanting to really get to know Maron should listen to the podcast, where they will find a much more authentic version of the comedian than his on-screen persona.

The podcast, which is mostly recorded in Maron's garage in Los Angeles, gives him a platform to speak his mind freely. He tackles every type of subject, often in conversations with famous guests – just like in the TV show. His real-life guests have included Chris Rock, Mel Brooks, fellow Just for Laughs festival performer Bill Burr, and even musicians like Iggy Pop.

"It doesn't necessarily have to be funny. It just has to be immediate," he said. "It's vey nourishing to the soul, and exciting and interesting."

He described himself as "undeniably Jewish" – culturally, not religiously.

"I think I represent somewhat of the contemporary stereotype of the neurotic self-involved, kind of mildly hypersensitive, a bit defensive and also probing and searching," he said.

Fans of his work rave about his honesty and willingness to touch upon any topic with his guests. He's candid about his own struggles, never shying away from difficult topics like his past addictions to alcohol and drugs.

Despite his forays into TV and podcasting, he is a standup comedian at heart.

"At some point when I was a little kid, I wanted to become a comic," he said. "They seem to have a way figured out through the world. It's at the core of who I am."

Marc Maron will perform two shows for Toronto's Just for Laughs Festival, both on Sept. 24 at the Queen Elizabeth Theatre.

Jeweller's song makes it big 17 years later

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Sam Rosenbaum's recent experience of what he called divine intervention brought his words and music to a show about the supernatural.

Almost 20 years ago, the Toronto jeweller's father, who had died seven years earlier, came to him in a dream.

"We were sitting in this beautiful garden. We didn't speak. We looked at each other," he said. "It was really an incredible feeling."

When he woke up in the middle of the night, he ran down to his basement and wrote a song called Why Did You Leave Me Now?

A singer he was managing at the time, Liz Rodrigues, recorded the song. Nothing big came of it – until this summer, when Rosenbaum, 61, got a call from Gary Calamar, musical director of the popular HBO show True Blood.

Apparently, the producers had been searching for him for a long time. They somehow got a hold of the song, and wanted to use it during the credits of the penultimate episode of the season.

"It was one of those bizarre things in life," Rosenbaum said, adding that at first he was wary, wondering how they could have found his song. But he did some research and realized it was the real thing.

ISRAEL MUSEUM ACQUIRES GIFT OF WORKS BY RICHARD AVEDON

Some 74 photographs by famed photographer Richard Avedon, created between 1969 and 1974, have been gifted to the Israel Museum of Jerusalem. The works include Avedon's iconic oversized mural – 20-feet-wide and eight-feet-high -of Allen Ginsberg's family.

Avedon began his career in the mid-1940s as a genre-bending fashion photographer, who introduced narrative elements into traditional fashion spreads. In 1969 he adopted what would become his signature portrait style – subjects posed singly and in groups against stark white backgrounds that allowed their personalities to emerge. The works gifted to the Israel Museum capture this moment of transition in his career.

The Avedon photographs are scheduled to go on view at the Israel Museum in the spring.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Richard Avedon's iconic oversized mural of Allen Ginsberg's family is on view, along with around 70 others photographs at the Israel Museum of Jerusalem.

Jewish Cuban Fusion: Musician David Buchbinder teams up with pianist Hilario Duran and Odessa/Havana, a crew of top jazz musicians, to perform Jewish-Cuban fusion music at the Small World Music Festival. Political Corner: One might expect an organization that purports to care about justice and peace in the Middle East to speak out about the recent poison-gas atrocities in Syria or the millions of refugees and displaced people there. Perhaps it might also spare a word or two about Iran, the chief supporter and exporter of terrorism across the Middle East, which is in the final stages of building a nuclear weapon. And then there is Egypt . . . the list goes on.

Despite its misleading name, Canadians for Justice and Peace in the Middle East (CJPME) is largely a propagandistic pro-Palestinian advocacy organization. In the ridiculously simplistic and myopic view of CJPME members and the Israeli-apartheid left, Israel is irredeemably tainted, deserving of boycott, divestment, sanction and worse.

As expected, its membership is leavened with some of the country's most ardent anti-Israel activists, including John Greyson, the Toronto filmmaker currently languishing in an Egyptian prison after being arrested while on his way to Gaza. Greyson gained notoriety in 2009 through an attempt to shame the Toronto International Film Festival for highlighting the city of Tel Aviv.

Recently a group of Canadian writers issued an open letter under CJPME's banner, protesting an Israeli plan to relocate some Palestinians and Bedouins in the Southern Hebron Hills. Four respected writers – Wayson Choy, Nino Ricci, Kyo Maclear and Terry Fallis – are giving a reading in Toronto this week in support of that protest and CJPME in general.

Without wishing to diminish the right of the writers to express their political opinions, it seems a shame that they have lent their good names to bolster the reputation of the seriously biased CJPME. The writers should bear in mind that their own credibility is also at stake. Future biographers will certainly wonder at their precipitous rush to adopt Israel as their political-protest "Flavour of the Month," to the telling exclusion of countless, far more pressing concerns in every corner of the world.

Series known for ending credit music

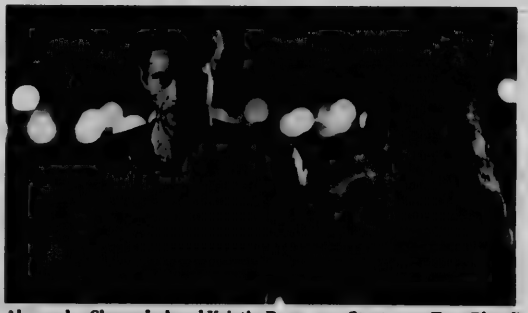
True Blood is known for its ending credit music. The title of the song each week becomes the name of the episode. Calamar told the Toronto Star that it was the title of the song that attracted the producers after they found it on iTunes.

Rosenbaum described watching the episode as very surreal.

"Even until the last second, I wasn't sure it would be on. I've had so many disappointments in the music business," he said, explaining that he had hoped to make it big in the industry, but it never worked out.

Hearing it on TV, Rosenbaum said it felt like a gift from, and a tribute to, his father – and it's also been nice to have validation of his work.

"I've loved all the comments I've been getting," he said. "When you go on YouTube and read the comments, a lot of people relate to the song. A lot of people said it made them cry or it puts them in a good place. It makes them feel good."



Alexander Skarsgård and Kristin Bauer van Straten as True Blood's Eric and Pam [HBO photo]

He said people have been downloading the song on iTunes, and tens of thousands of listens have been logged on sites like YouTube.

"One of the lines is, 'Why did you leave me now just when they said you are fine?'" he said. "Everyone can relate, everyone has had a loss of some kind."

Three young Winnipeggers 'live the dream' in NYC

Alex Frohlinger, right, in Soul Doctor

Josh Assor just completed his first run on Broadway.

WINNIPEG — This city's Jewish community has historically been known for exporting talented performers – among them Monty Hall of Let's Make a Deal fame and comedian David Steinberg.

Three young Winnipeggers – Alex Frohlinger, Josh Assor and Lindsay Nelko – are following in the footsteps of Winnipeg Jewish actors who have gone before them.

Nelko, 27, is a choreographer for the TV series So You Think You Can Dance and will be choreographing her own show in New York City next summer.

Assor, 24, just completed his first run on Broadway in Mary Poppins.

Frohlinger, also 24, has just made her Broadway debut in Soul Doctor, the musical based on the life of Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach.

"I am still just taking it all in," says Frohlinger. "I told my parents when I was seven that I wanted to have a career on the stage."

Her entire family flew in from Winnipeg and elsewhere for opening night on Aug. 15 at the Circle in the Square theatre. Frohlinger plays the role of a holy beggar and is the understudy for another role.

Frohlinger and her two younger siblings, Joey, 22, and Becky, 19, have been performing in musical theatre almost all their lives. (Becky is currently enrolled in a musical theatre program in North Carolina while Joey just started working for Microsoft in Seattle.)

They all began their careers early in life on Winnipeg stages. Alex learned tap, jazz and ballet at the Royal Winnipeg Ballet School. After graduating from the Gray Academy of Jewish Education, she moved to Boston to study music and dance at the Boston Conservatory, graduating in 2010.

Immediately afterward, Frohlinger was signed to a touring production of West Side Story. Over the next two years, she travelled all over North America. The tour finished in the summer of 2012 in Japan.

"It was a life-changing period," she says of the tour. "I learned a lot about life on the road and life in general."

As for her current production, she says she watched the show evolve from the beginning. "There's a piece of all of us [the actors and production staff] in the show," she says. "We are receiving standing ovations after every performance. It's an open-ended run, and we hope Soul Doctor runs for a long time."

Josh Assor was bitten by the performing arts bug in high school in Winnipeg. He started as a dancer in his high school's performing arts program and moved into singing as well. But it has been as a dancer that he's making his mark.

In 2009, Assor was performing at Stratford. Over the past few years, he has found himself in demand as a dancer, choreographer, teacher and dance judge throughout North America. He has won numerous awards for his choreography including a national award at L.A. Dance Force. He was recently a featured choreographer for I Move Forward, a cancer benefit show, as well as for the Toronto Choreographers Ball.

As with Frohlinger, his path to Broadway began with an extended road tour – in his case in the Mary Poppins road production – which also toured North America. After a year, he was promoted to the long-running Broadway show.

Assor played the role of Neleus, a Greek statue in the park that comes to life at various times and dances.

"Opening night for me was very special," he says. "I loved the role. It was made for me. It was an unbelievable experience."

The Broadway production came to an end in March after seven years. Since then, Assor has received his green card and has been doing a lot of teaching and workshops. He also filmed a commercial in Florida and was back in Winnipeg to appear as a dancer in a Manitoba Opera Company staging of Aida.

He's also busy auditioning for future roles.

Unlike Assor and Frohlinger, Nelko prefers to remain behind the scenes.

The rising star has dancing and choreography in her genes. Her mother, Shelley Shearer, is a lifelong dance teacher in Winnipeg (the Shelley Shearer School of Dance) and Lindsay began her own training at a very young age. By age 14, she was an assistant teacher at he mother's school, and she won her first choreography award at the Manitoba Dance Festival when she was 15.

Nelko's big break came through her participation in the annual Pulse on Tour dance conventions in New York, which allowed her to showcase her work in front of the industry's biggest names.

She won four Choreographer's Pick Honours between 2010 and 2012 culminating in the Pulse Featured Choreographer award last year. As a result, leading choreographer/producer Brian Freedman took her under his wing. He hired her to work on The X Factor.

Another famed choreographer, Desmond Richardson, recommended her for So You Think You Can Dance. Her first choreographed piece for the show was shown on July 9 and won rave reviews.

"Being a choreographer on So You Think You Can Dance was such an incredbile experience and I am so grateful," Nelko says.

In early August, Nelko finished as second runner-up at the Capezio A.C.E Awards (for choreographic excellence) in New York. Although she's now based in Los Angeles, she is looking forward to returning to New York next summer to stage a show which is part of her prize.

In the meantime, her recent exposure has opened a lot of new doors for her in Los Angeles.

"It is a very exciting time," she says.

New Year musings: the 6 a.m. club

Senior Side of Life
Michael Gordon

It was another typical morning. I arrived at the health club Body and Soul, which is close to my home so that I can manage to get my exercise in before going to work. I generally arrive by 6 a.m. on weekdays and 7 a.m. on weekends.

The best thing about that time of morning is that there are only a few members there, including three Jewish women who, with me, have become part of an informal early morning "club" who share, besides our exercise routines, issues of life, family, film, books and all the minor but at the same time central subjects of humanity. Some of us have had professional or personal connections prior to meeting at the club: the ties are convoluted in the usual way of zero degrees of separation that often occur once one delves beyond the obvious identifying attributes.

Rosh Hashanah week, while we were congregating, the conversation naturally was directed to the meals that we all shared with our families and friends. At one point I was on one of those supposedly beneficial upper and lower body "elliptical machines" that avoid putting too much pressure on joints, which, for me, is necessary because of my 72-year-old less-than-perfect knees. As I read my latest novel on my Kobo, I overheard the conversation of my three "buddies" near me using various exercise machines.

The conversation naturally turned to the dishes that they served and ate over the holidays, with explicit descriptions of the content, the taste and, in some cases, the accompanying recipe. One of the group bemoaned the fact that her apple cake was a bit of a "flop," literally and figuratively because she used cake flour instead of self-rising flour, a detail I did not really understand, but the two other women did, as they shared successful and unsuccessful Rosh Hashanah baking stories, experiences and favourite recipes.

One common theme is the traditional honey cake, which is not just a hallmark of Rosh Hashanah baking, but in some ways, a reflection of the baking talent of a Jewish woman's kitchen skills. To say that someone's honey cake is "the best," because of its moistness, flavour, appearance is a great compliment and one I know I honestly espouse because my wife's honey cake recipe is indeed "the best."

The humour in this interchange is that it reflected the new paradigm of the educated late middle age and early geriatric (which is me) population. The other three members of our group are in their mid-50s to mid-60s. We are all very knowledgeable about the importance of exercise and healthy eating in long-term health. But a countervailing force is our collective love for many of the traditional Jewish holiday dishes, and, like the name of our health club, it represents the "soul" of our identity beyond what is "good for us."

The soul part of our love of sharing special recipes, even if modified to be "healthier," still mirrors our long collective history of the devotion that goes into food and its ability to bring families together as part of a special shared experience.

Some exercise machines indicate how many calories are burned during the workout, but what they do not do is tell us how many calories were in the slice of honey or apple cake, potato kugel and challah we ate, which is a good thing.

If they did, we would likely have to move into the club for a day and night of constant exercise in order to burn off Rosh Hashanah dinner. Since that is not going to happen, at least we can collectively share how much we ate, how wonderful it was, and prepare for the next holiday meal with the commitment to keep exercising in-between – making sure that we follow the dictum of our club's name, "Body and Soul."

SCHOOL BUDDIES: The buddy program of the Thomas & Marjorie Schwartz Preschool Centre (formerly the MNjcc Nursery School) and Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School is off to a sweet start! Paul Penna Grade 6 students were introduced to their preschool buddies during the first week of school and will continue to engage in a range of activities together – such as swimming, planting and holiday themed crafts – throughout the school year. Pictured enjoying a good book are Levy and Stella.

Simchat Torah – roll those scrolls

Norene Gilletz
Special to The CJN

Leah Schapira and Victoria Dwek are on a roll with the publication of their latest cookbook in their popular Made Easy Series. When Passover Made Easy was completed, they decided that their next project should be a cookbook that featured the type of food they loved to cook and eat. Dwek explained: "After polling all our neighbours, we concluded that everyone is always looking for more starter and side dish ideas."

Starters and Sides Made Easy (Artscroll) features 60 of their favourite triple-tested recipes for scrumptious starters and side dishes that will enhance any meal. Each recipe is accompanied by a colour photo.

"When I am entertaining or having the family over for a holiday meal, I don't want my kitchen to be messy when guests arrive. I like to prepare everything in advance, pull it out of the fridge or freezer and pop it in the oven, so Leah and I added "Ahead" tips for every recipe in this book," Dwek said.

Schapira added: "When I am looking for a side dish to go with a dinner, I want something quick and easy to make. But sometimes easy doesn't mean quick. The recipes in our book are about having ideas you love at your fingertips or using ingredients that you can find at your local supermarket."

Here are some suggestions to serve your family and friends for your Simchat Torah celebrations. Let the good times roll!

CORNED BEEF SPINACH SPRING ROLLS

Leah Schapira writes: "Give me a spring roll, and I'll eat it. I've stuffed them with avocado, brisket, vegetables... I've even stuffed these wrappers with brownies and fried them for dessert. These, though, are my best spring rolls yet. Of course they're better fried, but these also actually work very well when they are baked."

2 tbsp. oil
1 onion, diced
1 16-oz. bag frozen chopped spinach
1 tsp. garlic powder
1 tsp. onion powder
3/4 tsp. salt
2 tbsp. mayonnaise
2 tsp. mustard
1/8 tsp. black pepper
12 spring roll wrappers
6 oz. deli corned beef, cut into thin strips
1 tsp. cornstarch dissolved in 3 tbsp. water
Dipping Sauce
2 tsp. yellow mustard
1/4 cup mayonnaise
1 tbsp. brown sugar

Heat oil in a sauté pan over medium-high heat. Add onion and sauté until completely soft, about 7 minutes. Add spinach and continue to sauté until spinach is completely cooked, about 15 minutes. Add garlic powder, onion powder, salt, mayonnaise, mustard and black pepper.

Place a spring roll wrapper on your work surface. Shape 1-1/2 tbsp. of spinach mixture into a log-shaped mound in the centre of the wrapper. Place 1-1/2 tbsp. corned beef over spinach mixture. Fold in the two sides, then fold the bottom half of the wrapper over the filling. Roll up to completely enclose. Brush the top edge with a bit of the cornstarch mixture to seal. Spring rolls can be frozen at this point.

To bake the spring rolls, preheat oven to 425. Line a baking sheet with aluminum foil and grease with nonstick cooking spray. Place spring rolls on the sheet, leaving space between them. Spray the tops and sides with nonstick cooking spray. Bake for 18 minutes, or until crispy. (Alternatively, you can fry the spring rolls: Heat 1-2 inches oil in a saucepan. When hot, add spring rolls and fry until crispy, 3-4 minutes per side.)

Prepare the dipping sauce: In a small microwave-safe dish, combine mustard, mayonnaise, and brown sugar. Stir to combine. Microwave for 30 seconds, or until sugar has dissolved. Stir again. Serve with spring rolls. Makes 12 spring rolls.

Variation: Keep this recipe pareve by omitting the corned beef. Or even better... swap the meat for cheese if you want to serve these at a dairy meal.

Ahead: The spring rolls will freeze well. Freeze raw after Step 2 and bake or fry fresh. You can also prepare the dipping sauce in advance and refrigerate. Let it come to room temperature before serving.

CRISPY CHICKEN ROLLS WITH HONEY-GARLIC DIPPING SAUCE

Victoria writes: "Whenever I sit down to create a menu for a party I'm hosting, I think about how I can dress up my family's latest weeknight favourites. One of these favourites is Leah's crispy chicken wraps, which she stuffs with onions, red cabbage, well-seasoned schnitzel, and an awesome sauce, because, as she believes, a good sandwich deserves layers. And I agree! This adapted version takes the dish from the dinette table to the dining room."

1 tbsp. oil, plus more for frying
1 onion, cut into very thin strips
5 (10-in.) whole-wheat wraps
Chicken:
1 lb. chicken cutlets, pounded thin
1 tsp. salt, divided pinch coarse black pepper
1 1/2 tbsp. minced garlic, divided
3/4 cup panko crumbs
1 tsp. chili powder
3/4 tsp. paprika
1 egg
Red Cabbage Salad
1 1/4 cups red cabbage
2 tbsp. vinegar
1 tsp. oil
1/4 tsp. sugar
1/4 tsp. salt
Honey Garlic Dipping Sauce
1/2 cup mayonnaise
1/4 cup water
2 tbsp. honey
2 garlic cloves, crushed
1/4 tsp. paprika
pinch coarse black pepper

Heat oil in a sauté pan over medium heat. Add onion and sauté until soft and lightly golden, about 10 minutes. Set aside.

Season chicken with 1/2 tsp. salt, pepper, and 1/2 tbsp. minced garlic.

In a shallow dish, combine panko crumbs, chili powder, paprika, 1 tbsp. minced garlic and 1/2 tsp. salt. Lightly beat egg in a second shallow dish. Dredge chicken in egg, then coat in crumbs.

Heat a thin layer of oil in a sauté pan over medium heat. When oil is hot, add chicken and cook for 3-4 minutes per side. Remove to a paper towel-lined plate. When cool enough to handle, cut chicken into thin evenly sized strips.

Prepare the red cabbage salad: in a small bowl, combine cabbage, vinegar, oil, sugar and salt. Set aside.

Prepare the honey-garlic dipping sauce: in a small bowl, whisk together mayonnaise, water, honey, garlic, paprika and pepper.

Assemble the wraps: Spread a tablespoon of the honey-garlic dipping sauce across the bottom-centre of the wrap. Top with onions, chicken strips and 1/4 cup red cabbage. Make sure the filling is evenly distributed. Fold the bottom of the wrap over the filling and tuck under very tightly. Fold in the sides and continue to roll, egg roll-style, holding your fingers under the roll so that it remains very tight. Slice each wrap, sushi-style, into six pieces. Secure by threading a skewer through the edge of the wrap and the chicken. Repeat with remaining wraps and serve with remaining honey-garlic dipping sauce. Yield: 30 roll-ups.

Ahead: Although best fresh, these skewers can be assembled earlier in the day. Serve at room temperature or reheat briefly so as not to cook the cabbage.

CINNAYUMS

1 frozen challah defrosted, not baked
2 tsp margarine, melted • 1 egg, beaten
2 tbls cinnamon • 1/4 c brown sugar

Unravel dough braids & gather dough together: on floured surface, separate dough into into 2 lg. rectangles; roll to ¼" thick. Brush with margarine. Sprinkle with cinnamon & sugar; leave 1" border on all sides. Roll dough, jelly roll style into 2 long rolls. Seal edges into dough. Coat 9"x13" pan with baking spray. Slice each log into ½" discs; place in pan, touching. Allow to rise 30-45 min. Brush with beaten egg. Bake in preheated 400 °oven 10-12 min until golden. Remove from oven; spread with icing while warm.

ICING : 1 ½ c icing sugar
1 tsp vanilla extract • 1-3 tbls water

In small bowl mix together sugar, vanilla, 1 tbl. water. Smooth with fork, adding water as needed for creamy, spreadable consistency.

Community Focus

The Canadian Jewish news

Section B

This year's Community Focus supplement highlights some of Canada's influential, impressive, up-and-coming Jews – people who may be on their way to becoming household names in the Jewish community, and beyond. We've profiled a variety of professionals from areas such as business, the arts, media, technology and community service. One thing all of the subjects have in common is a passion for their craft and a drive to succeed, which we hope will inspire our readers to believe that no dream is unattainable.

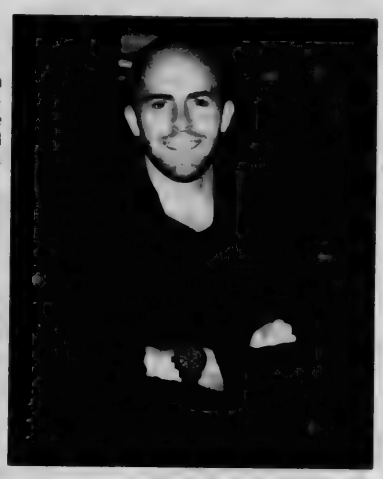
Professional network founder's hard work pays off

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter



He's not yet in his 30s, but Julian Brass has spent years working tirelessly to make a name for himself as founder of the national young professional network Notable.ca.

He'll be the first to tell you that when he launched the site in 2008, which was then known as NotableTV.com, it wasn't all smooth sailing.

Brass had to "work his ass off," to turn the site, described as "a premier lifestyle guide for young professionals across Canada," into the brand that now attracts more than one million readers each month.

After graduating from the University of Guelph's Bachelor of Commerce program with a major in hospitality management, Brass moved to Silicon Valley in California to work for a social networking and online dating website called Engage.com.

Brass spent just over a year with the startup before parlaying the knowledge he gained into starting a business he described as his passion.

"Notable was created to really help people [feel that] they're not the only one out there who's facing these highs or facing these lows. It's really intended to be that online resource – that toolkit – that brings content and a brand to like-minded young professionals, which helps them go further in their careers and their lives in general, every day," Brass said.

The site, he added, is intended "to be the digital brand that connects young professionals across Canada with everything they need to empower themselves to live the most notable life they can."

Notable.ca – which was named a finalist in nextMEDIA's Digital Hot List contest, and runner-up in the KPGM-sponsored competition called "Canada's Next Great Start-Up" – features pieces on travel, entertainment, the hottest restaurants, the newest trends in technology, and business profiles on other successful young professionals.

In the years since Brass launched Notable.ca, the site has expanded into cities across Canada, and now has a presence in Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver and Calgary.

Brass hopes to make Notable bigger and better

"We have localized editions that, from a street level, and a local level, give young Canadian professionals all those different perspectives," he said, adding that he also has ambitions to expand into the United States.

Brass said in addition to entrepreneurship, another of his passions that fits well with the Notable mantra, is motivational speaking.

He said he loves the idea of helping people "figure out exactly how to go after what it is that they want to do with their life."

Tapping into his motivational speaker persona, Brass insisted that the secret to success is the age-old adage that if you believe in yourself, nothing can get in your way.

"I really believe that we're all pretty equal, but everyone has different talents. And it's just a matter of harnessing yours, staying true to what your vision is and what you really believe in," said Brass, who was recently named one of "Toronto's Hottest Young Entrepreneurs" by the Globe and Mail, and recognized as one of the "Five Geeks and Gurus Every Marketer Should Meet" by Marketing magazine.

He understands that many people have fears about diving headfirst into a risky venture.

And even if people can put their fears aside and gain the courage needed to take the plunge, they may not be preparing themselves for the challenges of keeping their business afloat, he added.

"Staying afloat is being ready for all of the curveballs that come your way, whatever they may be. There are so many when you're starting a business. But stay positive and stay confident in yourself and your abilities and your capabilities, and the ideas that made you say, 'I'm going to go after this,' in the first place. That's the toughest part for me as an entrepreneur."

He said it's all too easy for people to start beating themselves up when they run into roadblocks, and ultimately, to give up.

"The reason why Notable is where it is today is because during the tough times, I really carefully looked at what wasn't working and [thought about] how I could make it work. When you do that enough, you really start to become an expert at seeing opportunities," Brass said.

Of course, there are ideas that may not ever come to fruition, but "if you say, 'I'm going to build a business no matter what,' you will build that business no matter what. It might be slightly different than you originally anticipated, but you can do it. Because if it's not you, it's going to be someone else."

Brass added that it's also helpful to seek the advice and mentorship of successful people who have already gone through the ups and downs of building something from nothing.

"Find your mentors, find your colleagues… Do your market research, have a solid business plan. But understand that in today's rapidly changing world, you have to be flexible and you can't be stuck in your ways," he warned.

Despite his business being his primary focus, Brass also makes time to volunteer for Jewish organizations including Technion Canada, which raises funds and awareness for Haifa's Technion – Israel Institute of Technology.

Formerly the vice-chair of the organization's Generation Next group, Brass is now the youngest board member.

He said he's donated time and even ad space on his website to other Jewish organizations including Israel Cancer Research Fund and Jewish National Fund.

"It's extremely important [to me to be involved in the Jewish community], and it's something I'm really passionate about. A lot of these causes that these organizations believe in are very relevant to young professionals, both Jewish and non-Jewish. It allows me, as the final decision-maker, to leverage the huge audience that Notable.ca has to help support these great causes," Brass said.

While he enjoys his motivational speaking gigs and volunteering for organizations that resonate with him, he said his primary focus remains Notable.ca, which he hopes will continue to grow bigger and better.

"We're constantly changing and evolving and really trying to make sure we're always getting back to our vision of connecting young professionals with Notable and helping them live their best life," Brass said.

"We really do work our asses off every single day to make sure we're delivering on that promise."

Applying to Medical School? Law School? Dental School?

It is increasingly difficult to gain admission to many professional school programs, such as medicine, law, dentistry, pharmacy and business, given the dramatic rise in applications for a limited number of positions. Since applications to professional schools have doubled in the last ten years, gaining admission requires careful planning – even for students with impressive credentials. No aspect of the application process can be overlooked.

Does someone you know need help with the university application process?

Expert advice can make the process less daunting. Whether the task is helping a student plan for eventual medical school admission, critiquing application essays for U.S. dental schools, or preparing for CASPer or Multiple Mini Interviews ("MMIs"), we work one-on-one with our clients to maximize their chances of success. The result is the strongest application possible, one that highlights each student's unique character and individual strengths.

Canadian TV exec sets his sights on TV Guide Network

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

Critics may be pointing to the demise of television, but for Bradley Schwartz, a leader in the North American television industry, there's nowhere to go but up.

The Toronto native recently landed a new job working in Los Angeles as president of entertainment and media at TV Guide Network (TVGN) – a CBS/Lionsgate partnership.

"I feel like everything I've done in my career has led me to this opportunity. I could not be more excited about it. I feel it is the greatest entrepreneurial opportunity in all of television," Schwartz said.

And there's a reason they wanted Schwartz for this particular job: he's spent more than 20 years in the field developing new channels – such as bringing MTV to Canada – and revitalizing failing channels, like when he brought an American channel, FUSE, back to life.

He'll be tasked with rebranding the 32-year-old TVGN, in charge of programming, scheduling and marketing.

For most people, the words "TV Guide" conjure images of a magazine that once listed show times.

But the channel, which lists TV channel locations and programming information, running in more than 80 million homes, is ready for a change – and Schwartz has been brought on to maximize its potential.

Bradley Schwartz, credited with bringing MTV to Canada in 2005, posed with the cast and crew of one of MTV Canada's hit shows, The After Show.

"We just have blue sky in front of us to turn this thing into a wonderful success," he said.

Schwartz, who has been in the business since he was 21, has had opportunities to learn from some of the industry's biggest names.

At 21, he landed his first job in the media business working as an assistant to Lorne Michaels at Saturday Night Live.

"That's where I learned TV. It was like getting an MBA in television," said Schwartz, 42.

"It was 1992 to 1993. The year that Letterman left NBC and Michaels was given the reigns to Late Night and created The Conan O'Brien Show.

"For a young kid in the business, to watch all that and learn from all that, it was awesome. Lorne became a mentor in many ways. I ended up working for him for many years," he said.

For Schwartz, the desire to be part of the entertainment business came from a strong passion for marketing.

"Marketing came very naturally to me. As long as you really love marketing, then you might as well market what you love. For me, that was entertainment," Schwartz said.

But it was thanks to the experience he gained from working with the legendary Michaels that he caught the eye of MTV in New York, and would soon take on the project for which he became most famous: launching MTV Canada.

TV industry is 'a thrilling place to be,' Schwartz says

When the opportunity to bring MTV to Canada came out of a strategic partnership between CTV Inc. and Viacom Inc. (the owner of the MTV Networks), Schwartz didn't hesitate.

"They looked around to see if there were any Canadians in the room. I put my hand up. And then they said, 'Are there any other Canadians in the room?' And when there wasn't, I guess I was by default the best option," he said, laughing.

So after years away from his hometown, Schwartz returned to Toronto in 2005, with the task of building a brand from scratch.

Without a business plan or employees, Schwartz was handed the keys to the Masonic Temple in downtown Toronto, which was to become the home of MTV Canada.

"It was one of the most thrilling moments of my career. We put together one hell of a team. Along with the leaders at CTV, we launched one of the most successful television launches in Canadian TV history," he said.

"Six shows that we produced were on the air in the U.S. Those things just didn't happen in Canadian television for a cable network," Schwartz boasted, adding that 46 per cent of young Canadians were tuning in each week to shows including The Toronto native Bradley Schwartz is TVGN's president of entertainment and media.

After Show, Peak Season, and 1 Girl 5 Gays.

Just two years after the MTV launch, CTV's parent company, Bell Globemedia, bought CHUM Limited.

"All of the MuchMusic and MTV channels came together. We became a 400-person staff," said Schwartz, who then became senior vice-president and general manager of the Much MTV Group.

Schwartz, who remembers the gig as a "fun ride," said it was the "kind of job that wasn't a job," especially for someone who grew up surrounded with music.

He remembers turning on the TV to watch MuchMusic after his parents put him to bed at night.

While Schwartz was having the time of his life creating content for one of the most iconic Canadian brands, he discovered that he had a knack for creating something fresh and new, and revitalizing old, long-forgotten brands.

So in 2011, he again left Toronto to work for FUSE, a New York-based network that needed a push and a rebranding strategy to become the success it had the potential to be.

"I felt like I should go out on top. Go cash in all my chips and put them back on the table. I've never been one to sit back and hit your stride," Schwartz said.

"I came down and grabbed a hold of FUSE and wanted to turn that into something special."

His hard work paid off. FUSE received its first-ever Emmy nomination this year, along with the highest rated day, month, and quarter in FUSE history.

Schwartz is not one to shy away from a difficult task, and in this business, he's known as someone who can be trusted with turning around a less-than-successful brand. Thanks to his unique mix of business savvy and creativity, Schwartz was named one of the top 40 under 40 by Caldwell Partners International in 2011.

Schwartz's advice for those who strive to make it in his industry is to learn about both the business and entertainment aspects to the job.

"If you can put those two together successfully, you'll be a rare commodity. And people in this business are always looking for that," he said.

"I credit that to my mom and dad back home in Canada. Mom has an unbelievable creative background and a big heart and my dad ran businesses – those two things that I got from my parents have a lot to do with where I am today."

And as the nature of television radically changes every day, Schwartz says he's not worried about the place that television has in the future.

"The ability to have people watch your content wherever they want, whenever they want is only a good thing," he said.

"You just have to stay on top of it and ahead of it. That's why it's such a thrilling place to be right now."

Sweet Melissa founder could be Toronto's Cake Boss

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The countless reality baking shows on television, like Cake Boss, The American Baking Competition and Cupcake Wars, have spawned a worldwide fascination with outrageous custom cakes, and fostered competition between talented pastry chefs who are always trying to outdo one another.

But Melissa Abbou, the 24-year-old founder of a baking company called Sweet Melissa and one of Toronto's most promising new talents, insists it wasn't the TV genre that turned her on to her baking passion.

"I've always loved it. Initially, it wasn't something that I wanted to do professionally because I wanted to keep my passion and my thing that calmed me down... to myself," Abbou said.

"Then I was having a conversation with one of my teachers from high school and he said to me, 'Why wouldn't you want to do the thing you love most every single day?'"

That conversation inspired Abbou to completely alter her career path.

After applying for and getting accepted into York University's psychology program, she declined the offer, opting instead to take a year off from school to work.

She then applied to George Brown College, where she earned a baking and pastry arts management degree.

Since Abbou registered Sweet Melissa as a business in 2011, her clientele has been steadily growing.

When she first started out, Abbou's baked goods were entirely commissioned by friends and family.

"Now I'm doing orders for people that I have no idea who they are. They are getting my information from other people, hearing about me through word of mouth, they are finding me on Facebook."

Abbou said her clients call on her to make specialty custom cakes that you can't find on grocery store shelves.

"People come to me for an original cake, they want something creative, out of the box, that's why they come to me. And my cakes don't taste like store-bought cakes – they actually taste really good. And the flavours keep bringing them back. Almost all my clients are repeat clients," Abbou said.

But beyond the flavours, the cake has to look amazing too, Abbou said. She understands that for some functions, like birthday parties or even weddings, the presentation of the cake can be one of the highlights of a celebration.

Most recently, Abbou made a custom birthday cake in the shape of a minion from the Despicable Me films, and a Little Mermaid-themed cake.

"People always assume I'm such a great artist or painter, but to be honest, I can't do anything with a pen or a pencil. But if you put a piping bag in my hand or give me some fondant to sculpt, I can do that. That comes naturally to me. That's how I'm artistic in my own way," Abbou said.

Photographer brings out the exotic in the ordinary

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Photographer Gil Tamin can make an unsuspecting couple sitting on a bench look like they're posing for a magazine cover shot. He can make a European coastline look like a postcard.

Armed with his Canon EOS 5D Mark III DSLR camera, he's able to capture awe-inspiring beauty in the utterly mundane.

But until two years ago, 30-year-old Tamin didn't even own a camera. He stumbled onto his talent for photography by accident.

When he told his fiancée that he was looking for a hobby, she encouraged him to pick up a camera and have fun with it.

"I started out with a $500 camera, and after [I became] comfortable with it, a friend of mine hired me to help him take pictures at different events," he recalled.

Tamin quickly discovered that, although he was untrained, he had an innate talent for taking pictures. Beyond that, he said, working with cameras brought out another side of him.

"I can be a shy person, but for some reason, the camera makes me the opposite. It just makes me comfortable. I almost think about it as being in my own zone," said Tamin, who also works at his family-run auto body shop called Natanya Auto Body.

"It brings out a different side of me. I get really excited."

In the two years since Tamin dove head first into photography, he has landed corporate gigs, including photographing an event for the high-end makeup company Stila. He also freelances for non-profit organizations such as Weizmann Canada, and of course, he is often commissioned for weddings, bar mitzvahs and other important milestone events.

But what really inspires Tamin is being alone with this thoughts and his camera, while exploring beautiful landscapes.

"For me, I love landscapes. I just see something, and there's a light bulb in my head and I get excited," he said.

"I could be driving anywhere and I could just see something, and in my head I'm like, 'Oh my God, that would be a perfect picture'... I see something that may look like nothing to somebody else."

He explained that earlier this year, he was invited to his friend's cottage on the lake. On the way up, Tamin noticed an old, tiny, dilapidated cottage sitting next to a big tree.

His friend, who had driven past that old cottage every time he went up north, never noticed it.

"I stopped to take a picture, and he says, 'Why would you take a picture of that?' When he saw the photo I took, he was like, 'Wow,'" Tamin said.

"I try to make things that aren't so special look special. It doesn't have to be a crazy view of the water. It could be a door with an interesting colour. It's seeing something that draws my attention and [might] be nothing to somebody else, but to me, it's something special."

Abbou turns her passion into a career

Abbou, who works for the Royal Bank of Canada by day, and tends to her baking orders with every free moment she has, said her ambition is to open a storefront in Toronto within the next five years.

"I've been talking to the business account manager at RBC about government loans and business loans and how it would work. I really, really want it to happen. I think if I just build up my client base a little bit more, then my store should be successful."

In addition to custom cake orders, Abbou also hosts cupcake birthday parties.

"And hopefully, ideally, when I have a storefront, I'll have a little party room where people can do little birthday parties in my shop," she said.

"At the end of the day, I'm still only 24, so anything can happen. I'm trying, I really am trying. And the support that I'm getting from people – like, I have people referring me that I never would have even thought that they would pass on my name."

Abbou is currently working out of her home kitchen, which is kosher, but not COR-certified.

"There's nothing non-kosher about any ingredients that I use… And if a client really needs me to [bake in a certified] kosher kitchen then I can, for a fee, come to their place and do it there," she said.

While Abbou's cakes look like they should be featured on a TV baking competition, she doesn't think she could handle the anxiety that comes with those high-pressure situations.

"It's very intimidating, and I think being in such an intense environment like that, it might make me very anxious," she said with a laugh.

But of course, there are other ways to make it big in the baking industry.

You've got to work hard, and put in the hours, Abbou said.

"You've just got to try it. You can't be afraid and if it's something you really want to do, make it work for yourself. Because if it's going to make you happy, you should do it."

Farming Faulkners invest in Western Canada

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

With her salon hairstyle, designer outfits and downtown Toronto office, Joelle Faulkner could easily be taken for a high-achieving urban professional.

At 29, she's got degrees in chemical engineering, business administration and law (bachelor's and master's, no less), but the subject that puts a smile on her face and really gets her animated is land.

Not the kind you build condos on, but the kind that's used to grow things that require irrigation, crop rotation, drainage and silos.

Her style notwithstanding, Faulkner is a proud farm girl whose ties to the land go back at least a generation. Her family immigrated to Canada in 1938 as farmers; her dad, Tommy, is in the alfalfa seed business; and a great-granduncle is in the Canadian Agricultural Hall of Fame for bringing forage mixes to Canada.

Apparently, the apple doesn't fall far from the tree. Faulkner, together with her brother Benji, 31, is also in the farm business.

About a year ago, they launched Area One Farms, an enterprise that sees them pool investors' money and partner with local farmers to purchase land in Manitoba and Saskatchewan. They clear it and drain it – when necessary – and raise crops on it.

To date, they've acquired 22,000 acres of land spread over six farms. The main crops being raised are canola, wheat, soya beans, yellow mustard and corn.

If her projections are correct, they stand to generate a return of between 8 and 10 per cent from crops. Add in land appreciation, and the return could reach 14 per cent.

"You rarely get that from a crop here," she said, referring to her home province, Ontario.

Joelle is predicting that Area One will earn a profit of around $2.1 million. That's based on expected crop yields and current forward prices for September and October delivery.

"Right now, prices are below the five-year average," said Faulkner, suggesting her estimate could even be considered on the conservative side.

No doubt, that's what appealed to investors, who helped her raise nearly $23 million for the project. About 30 per cent of that was borrowed from banks. The rest came from family, friends and wealthy individuals with cash to invest.

The return on investment goes beyond what their capital would have generated from Ontario farms. The main reason goes back to the price of real estate. Out west, Area One can acquire land for $800 to $2,500 an acre.

"A lot of Ontario land is trading at $6,000 to $25,000 an acre," she said. There's a reason for that: "Most of the land in southern Ontario is going to be better than any of the land I'm buying."

Even the best land in Western Canada sells for only $8,000 an acre, Benji pointed out.

"Ontario land is more expensive, but it's also more productive. You can grow 40 per cent more crop in Ontario," largely because "you have more growing days" in a season, he said.

Some of the land purchased in Manitoba and Saskatchewan requires work to get it ready for farming, Joelle explained.

Rhodes scholar works the land

"We clear trees to make more cropland. We remove fences and we drain wet spots. All of which opens the farm to make more arable acres."

"It can be expensive, but it's way cheaper than buying the land cleared," she added.

An important element of their business model is to collaborate with local farmers.

"Each farm has a partner, somebody with a really good track record for crop farming who is invested in the place," she said.

That person manages the land, does the planting and determines how best to sell it – whether to hedge or not. Often, Area One's partners are young farmers looking to expand their properties, but don't have the capital to acquire adjacent land. Area One buys into the property as well as their equipment and they share the profits, Joelle said.

"The deal with the farmers makes them more profitable and us more profitable. It's a win-win and if we can't find a win-win, we don't do it."

An added bonus is that Area One brings the farmers together to share skills. Some may be better at planting, others at selling.

"We'll take the more successful ones to teach the others how they did it," she said.

"The reason we can partner with these guys is that we're farmers. We can identify with them and if there are problems, we can help them."

Yes, she is a farmer, but perhaps what sets her apart are her four degrees, each earned "one year faster than normal." Oh, and she's a Rhodes Scholar and a Fulbright Scholar to boot.

Her LinkedIn profile notes that while studying law at Stanford University, she was involved in the development of a device to treat pulmonary edema as well as a mechanical ventilator; she worked at Cooler Solutions, helping develop products for Alzheimer's sufferers; and she worked at ROY-L Capital in Ontario to support various health initiatives.

So how did a clearly accomplished woman with four degrees come back to farming?

Credit her brother with coming up with the idea. Benji manages two Ontario farms, one in Guelph, as well as a large dairy farm in London with 1,000 milk-giving Holsteins and another 300 to 450 "dry cows" that are pregnant.

He traveled to Manitoba quite a bit on business and, seeing the price of land out west, came up with the idea.

It was a concept that appealed to Joelle and though they were more familiar with the dairy industry, they found the land there more suitable for raising beef or crops.

"I like crops and if the price is low, or you don't like it, you can put it into a silo until you do like it," she said.

She and Benji travel to the prairies twice a month to check on the investments, look for new opportunities and discuss with their partners any issues that might crop up.

"I look for new land and for people who want to expand their farms," Benji said.

The Faulkners have become familiar figures to lots of prairie folk. That's helped them in their quest for new farm partners.

"They know us," said Benji, who lives on his London farm. "We're pretty established. We've had the business for 30 years and been out west for the last 10."

Farm folk take to farm folk. The money flows in, land gets cleared, crops are raised and taken to market and profits flow back.

It's the cycle of life, 21st century style, planned from a downtown Toronto office tower by an urbane young professional.

CP24 reporter loves being a part of the story

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Technically, Sandie Benitah's job at CP24 requires that she work behind the scenes as the Toronto news channel's supervising web producer, but whether she likes it or not, she's also occasionally thrust into the limelight as an on-air reporter.

"It's a really great experience, but I'm like, the shyest girl in the world, so... that's actually the most nerve-wracking part of my job. It's something that I would never go for if I wasn't pushed into it," said the 32-year-old journalist.

"I'm a writer – that's what I've always wanted to do and that's what I love to do – which is why I joined the web. The camera stuff happened accidentally, but you know, it happens from time to time," she added.

Whether she's behind a desk or in front of a camera, Benitah said she loves being a reporter.

"I love the news aspect, and I love to write. As long as I'm covering the news, as long as I'm part of the story... and telling the story in whatever way, then that's great for me. But at the end of the day, I'll always be a writer at heart."

In 2007, Benitah joined Bell Media as a web journalist for CTVNews.ca. Three years later, she moved to CP24.com, where she's currently responsible for news content on the website. She can also be seen on air providing viewers with online reaction to top stories.

Sandie Benitah, CP24 supervising web producer, says she'll always be a writer at heart.

But before making the transition to broadcast, Benitah, a graduate of Ryerson University's journalism program, began her career as a print journalist with the Town Crier, a Toronto community newspaper.

Benitah, who was also a regular columnist for other newspapers including the Toronto Sun and The CJN, covered the city hall beat for the Town Crier.

"I love city politics. I just think that people should really understand that the municipal government is an important level of government and that it affects our everyday life more than any other level of government," she said.

With all the controversies surrounding Toronto Mayor Rob Ford – who has most recently been under fire for allegedly appearing drunk in public, for admitting he "smoked a lot of" marijuana, and of course, for the infamous video that reportedly showed the mayor smoking crack cocaine – people are starting to pay more attention.

"But people often think that municipal politics is boring and they don't see it as very sexy. Politics is just... I find it fascinating," said Benitah, whose career highlights include interviewing Prime Minister Stephen Harper, former Ontario premier Dalton McGuinty and former governor general Adrienne Clarkson.

Benitah feels lucky 'to work with people who get it'

Paris-born and Toronto-raised, Benitah can boast another attribute that is perhaps uncommon with Toronto-based journalists.

At the behest of her parents who encouraged her to retain her mother tongue, Benitah earned her French proficiency certificate from Sorbonne University in Paris in 2002.

At CP24, where she's been for the last three years, Benitah said her main focus is refining, editing and "making sure our site is as great as it can be. And just making sure our Twitter account is as good as it can be."

With more than 412,000 followers, Benitah said CP24's Twitter account is the most-followed of any Canadian news organization. Comparatively, fewer than 265,000 people follow CBC News' Twitter account, while Global News has about 28,000 followers.

"That's pretty big for us, and we really take a lot of pride in that," she said.

In addition to being proud to work at CP24, Benitah said she feels fortunate to be working with "strong, very inspiring, very empowering women.

"I'm just surrounded by people who are so smart and they get it. And in the news industry, especially today, it's really kind of great to work with people who get it," she said.

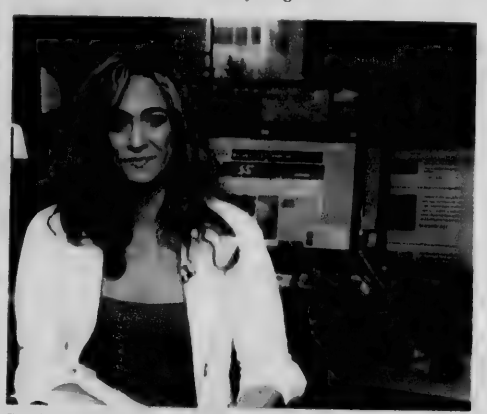
"I've worked in a lot of places where the people just don't get it. I'm really lucky."

The woman who inspires her most, Benitah said, is CTV News vice-president and CP24 general manager Joanne MacDonald.

"She's unbelievable. She's done such a great job of taking the station and making it into something that people respect and look forward to tuning into and keeping on all day. I think she's a really big part of that," Benitah said.

Having moved around from one news organization to another throughout her short, yet impressive career, Benitah is always open to new opportunities for growth.

"I guess something I often ask myself is, 'OK, what now? What next?' And I don't really ever have a satisfying answer to that. I just want to do a million things. I'd love to write a book. I know every journalist says that, but I've been thinking about it for a really long time."



Benitah during one of her on-air reports.

After someone close to her, who was suffering from a mental illness, passed away a few years ago, she decided to take a step back from news and "re-evaluate news in general and think about how we… tell stories."

Her ambition, Benitah said, is to write a book about mental illness that addressing the stigma surrounding it.

Until then, Benitah will be hard at work providing breaking news to Toronto's news junkies.

"I absolutely love my job… I love reporting."

A healthy mentality leads to a healthy lifestyle

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

Marni Wasserman's life is rooted in healthy eating. As a graduate of the Institute of Holistic Nutrition in Toronto and the Natural Gourmet Institute in New York, Wasserman is the founder of Delicious Knowledge, a company that focuses on teaching people how to cook whole foods.

Forget fad diets, says Wasserman, who insists that the key to maintaining a healthy weight is to change the way you think before you change the way you eat.

"People get so caught up in counting calories or carbohydrates and are always looking for a quick-fix to weight loss. I find the people who are able to let go of that mentality are the ones who are the most successful."

Wasserman's best advice for people who want to change their eating habits is to let go of the idea that they need to follow a conventional, often restrictive, diet.

"There is so much information on healthy living that it's overwhelming and hard to separate facts from myths," said Wasserman, who has been living a vegetarian lifestyle since she was 13.

Wasserman uses her passion, experience and expertise to educate her clients about adopting a realistic, plant-based diet that is both simple and delicious.

"The goal is to educate people on how to use wholesome whole food ingredients, and how to put them into recipes that can be used everyday so that people aren't intimidated," says Wasserman.

The mission of Delicious Knowledge, which she founded in 2009, is to inspire people to connect with their health. Her personal journey, from a personal trainer, to a certified chef, to a culinary nutritionist, has led her to where she is today: running a business that helps people live a plant-based lifestyle.

Wasserman, who started her business running cooking classes and workshops out of her home, before moving to her Eglinton Avenue studio in June, says, "My kitchen is a comfortable space – it's not one of those big industrial kitchens. The idea is to make people feel like they're cooking at home."

The Marni Wasserman Food Studio and Lifestyle Shop, Toronto's first plant-based food space, offers cooking classes, urban retreats and healthy living workshops that are all designed to help people focus on a healthier lifestyle.

The food space runs cooking classes on topics including easy weekday meals and healthy snacks, in addition to classes that focus on foods that can help prevent cancer, cardiovascular disease and osteoporosis.

With Wasserman's take on classic foods like pizza, pancakes, spaghetti and meatballs, and even chocolate cake, she promises people will not miss anything.

"One of the biggest fears people have is that healthy food doesn't taste good. They're worried about feeling deprived or that their families won't like the foods they make," she says.

"I see the response in my classes and people who take on my recipes and go home and say, 'Oh, my family loved that!'"

Ethnic cooking classes, for Asian, Indian or Mediterranean-inspired dishes, are also offered.

All the recipes in Wasserman's classes are built around fruit, vegetables, whole grains, nuts, seeds and healthy fats like avocado.

"Not only are these foods good for you," says Wasserman, "but they are also much less expensive than a diet that relies on animal proteins."

Actor perseveres in an unforgiving industry

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

Growing up as a middle child in a big family, actor Noah Cappe always had to find creative ways to draw attention to himself.

"I grew up in a family of eight kids and I was in the middle, so a big part of it was, 'Look at me! Look over here!' I was trying to get my share of the spotlight," said 35-year-old Cappe.

"Once I started to get laughs and reactions, I was drawn to it."

Cappe, who's appeared in over 100 television commercials and radio spots, got his start in musical theatre. He's a self-proclaimed performer and entertainer at heart.

Born and raised in Toronto, Cappe has come a long way since he landed his first gig in the late 1990s as a camp counsellor in a Cheerios commercial. But one of the highlights of his career was being asked to host live shows for the Vancouver 2010 Olympic Torch Relay.

Cappe spent over three months following the torch across Canada, performing two shows daily in each city, in front of crowds of up to 30,000 people.

"I got to perform in front of millions of people across the country, in stage-based, high energy shows," said Cappe.

"It was the coolest opportunity. I was just so proud to be Canadian and do all those things."

Other highlights in his career include a recurring role in a TV movie series called The Good Witch and recently being cast as the new voice of Molson Canadian for their radio, television, and Internet ads.

But like many in the entertainment business, with every high, there are many lows.

"People watch [celebrity gossip shows] TMZ or Entertainment Tonight and it's the glitz and glamour, but you've got to live with constant rejection. Going into a room and auditioning and putting yourself out there – you have to be comfortable with the fact that they didn't pick you," he said.

Avoid the shortcuts, Cappe advises

But even when he had to get other part-time jobs to pay the bills throughout his career, there was always a performance element to his jobs, such as being a part-time bar mitzvah DJ.

"It's been a long process, 15 years of working my way slowly and gradually up the ladder to finally being able to walk into an audition room and know the casting director and have a relationship with people in the industry. It's made me appreciate the process."

He knows first-hand how difficult it is for young people, especially in the Jewish community, who want to break from the traditional career path and follow one that's riskier.

"At what point do I pull the cord and say, 'I have to be an accountant because it's a guaranteed pay cheque?' But I've just been able to stick with it," he said, emphasizing that perseverance and patience are two vital skills anyone hoping to break into the entertainment business must have.

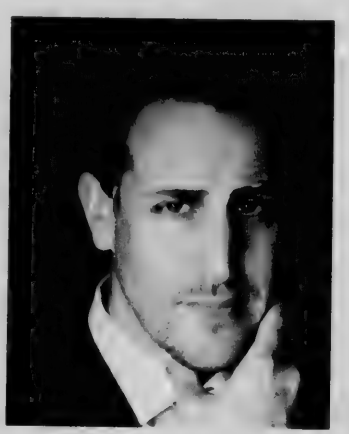
It's especially important not to get discouraged as you watch your friends and classmates land big roles, Cappe added.

"Scott Speedman was a buddy of mine. He auditioned for Felicity, and the next thing I knew, he was in movies," said Cappe.

"Rachel McAdams was in my class at York [University] and all of a sudden she was this mega movie star."

While it can be difficult to watch, he says that he learned not to compare himself to others and just believe in himself.

"You have to be comfortable enough to say, 'I have to steer my own ship and if I believe that I do good work, my time will come.' It may not be measured in dollar signs or awards won, but if you have a love for it, then at the end of the day, I'm [happy that I'm] able to live a great life, pay my bills, travel. I can't ask for more."



His advice to other up-and-coming actors is to avoid the shortcuts, like walking into a Hollywood agency that promises to make you a star – "all you have to do is give us $400 for headshots," he said.

"Do everything the right way. Spend the time and do the work."

In some ways, he's come full circle. He just recorded a voiceover for a new Cheerios commercial, the same company who gave him his first gig. But he's definitely a more confident actor and performer than he was 15 years ago, he said.

Like many actors, his goal is make it big and win an Oscar.

"Is that the real goal? No, my real goal is to be on Cribs," he joked. "My goal is just to keep moving forward."

Four Nights at the Opera

Did you know that throughout the evolution of opera, Jews have participated as subjects, composers, librettists, and performers?

Dr Joseph Gilbert is passionate about combining his love of opera, music, and their relationship to Judaic content. Through a series of four sessions, he will discuss opera and the Jewish experience

Session 1: Wednesday, October 2, 2013, 7:30 p.m.
A brief history of opera and the involvement of Jewish composers
The works of some famous Jewish opera composers had no mention or relationship to Judaism. Is this true? The works of Giacomo Meyerbeer, Jacques Offenbach, Kurt Weill, and others will be explored to reflect upon this question

Session 2: Wednesday, October 9, 2013, 7:30 p.m.
How have Jews been portrayed in opera? (Part 1)
Dr Gilbert will consider composers such as Giuseppe Verdi, Richard Wagner, and Camille Saint-Saens and probe their perceptions, among others, toward Jews from the 18th to the 20th centuries

Session 3: Wednesday, October 16, 2013, 7:30 p.m.
How have Jews been portrayed in opera? (Part 2)
Opera can be used for propaganda and political purposes. Recently, anti-Israel propaganda has crept into the opera world

Session 4: Wednesday, October 30, 2013, 7:30 p.m.
Jewish myths and folk tales have been the background for many operas
Familiar Jewish characters and religious parables have all been used as themes for opera and songs. Think of the Golem, the Dybbuk, and Gimpel the Fool

Please join us for this outstanding series.

Superfoods are essential to healthy living

Wasserman encourages people to include superfoods – natural foods that are low in calories and high in nutritional value – in every meal. She says one ingredient that is essential to healthy living is leafy green vegetables.

"People are often afraid of greens like kale, bok choy and Swiss chard because they don't know how to cook it. I show people how easy they are to prepare," Wasserman says.

Other superfoods featured in Wasserman's recipes are quinoa, tempeh (an Indonesian soy product), sweet potatoes, blueberries, goji berries and pumpkin seeds.

Wasserman insists that there is nothing healthier than a home-cooked meal that includes fresh, nutritious ingredients.

"Cook as much as you can from home, and focus on clean ingredients that are as close to nature as possible," Wasserman advises.

This means avoiding processed foods, take-out, and most products that come from a box.

On the other hand, she understands that busy families are often pressed for time. In addition to teaching people how to cook healthy foods, Wasserman also helps her clients make meal plans and manage their preparation time.

"I encourage people to spend a few hours once a week to get the basics done ahead of time," says Wasserman, who has ambitions to write and publish a nutrition book.

"Cook batches of whole grains like rice or quinoa, make salad dressings and sauces and prep proteins like tofu, tempeh or beans. Then, when it's time to eat, all you need to do is mix things together. When you take the time to plan ahead it makes everything more manageable."

In addition to group classes, Wasserman welcomes private events, such as corporate team-building events, and even bachelorette parties, in her food space.

For more information or to sign up for one of Wasserman's classes visit http://www.marniwasserman.com.

Of course, photography is about more than having a good eye. He said understanding how to properly use lighting and how to edit a picture to enhance it, can make the difference between a professional and an amateur.

According to his website, Tamin believes a picture should "tell a story that leaves you wondering," and should be able to be interpreted differently from one person to the next.

"Where one person sees sorrow, another can see hope and beauty," he wrote.

Tamin recently travelled on a European cruise, stopping in cities in Spain, Italy and France, where he was able to indulge in his passion.

"I'd never been to Europe in my life, and I'd never seen all that architecture before," he said. "It was all so foreign to me... I feel like I didn't get enough of it because I was there for such a short time. The pictures I took mean so much to me because they are reminders of what I was doing and where I was."

He said his favourite places to take pictures were Rome and the Amalfi Coast.

"Amalfi was the craziest thing I've ever seen. It felt like a dream. Going up the coast... you'll never see something like that anywhere else. It doesn't even feel real. Even when I look at the pictures I took, the pictures don't even do it justice."

With the experience Tamin has gained shooting corporate events, weddings and even landscapes, he hopes to turn his passion into his full-time career. He's currently working to establish himself enough to open his own photography studio.

"My expectations are so high... Every week, every day, they get higher and higher and I'm so critical of myself, so I always want so much more," he said.

Check out some of Tamin's work at www.giltaminphotography.com.

The Amalfi Coast, one of Tamin's favourite places in the world to photograph.

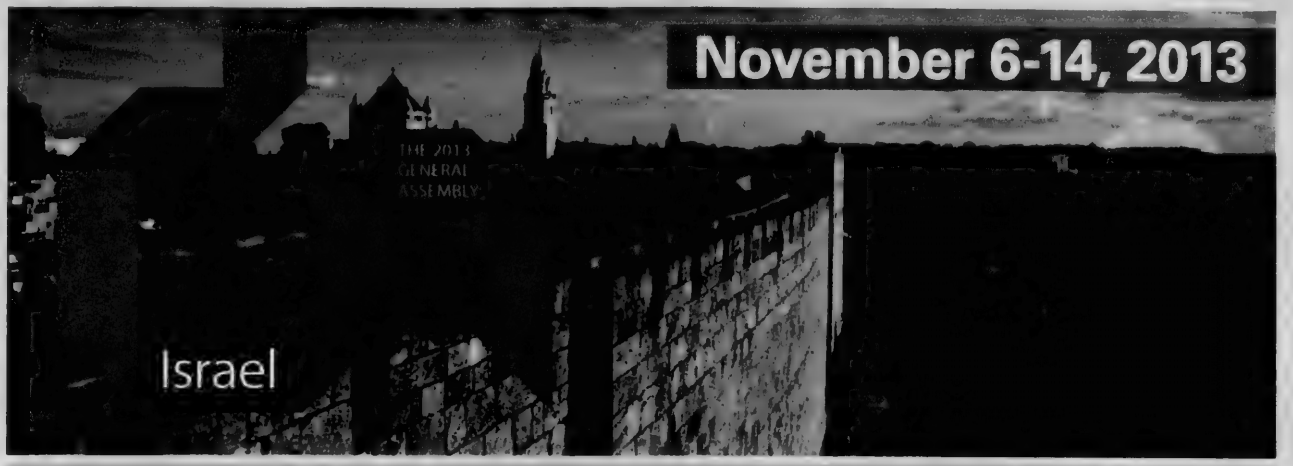
General Assembly Mission to Israel



Last chance to take advantage of this exclusive opportunity!

Register for the Mission and the GA by October 2nd and get a special offer - $200 OFF!

$3,975 land cost per person based on double occupancy*

Don't miss this amazing opportunity to attend the General Assembly being held in Jerusalem for the first time in 5 years with over 3,000 Jews from all over the world!

The General Assembly (the GA) is an annual gathering of Jewish Federations of North America and Jewish Communities from around the world held each year in November where the major issues affecting the Jewish World and Israel are discussed. This year's GA in Jerusalem will no doubt be an amazing experience, especially as part of UJA Federation's exciting and unique Mission.

Hear from a remarkable constellation of Israeli leaders who are changing the world and blazing new trails in politics, philanthropy, business, religion and culture.

Confirmed speakers include: Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Finance Minister Yair Lapid, Minister for Jerusalem and Diaspora Affairs Naftali Bennett, El Al CEO and Former Commander in Chief of the Israeli Air Force Eliezer Shkedi and CEO of SodaStream International Daniel Birnbaum.

The GA will culminate as we celebrate the centrality of Jerusalem to all Jews when we walk from Safra Square at Jerusalem's City Hall to the Kotel, and on to our closing gala at the Davidson Center (adjacent to the Kotel).

In addition, the UJA's Mission will include spending 3 days in Tel Aviv and enjoying a unique Shabbat experience; taking part in exclusive briefings with some of Israel's leading politicians, journalists and philanthropists; attending a performance by the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra; and travelling to UJA Federation's partnership region in beautiful Eilat where you will see how your UJA support has transformed this vital and flourishing region. Extensions are available. Enjoy luxury accommodations at the Carlton Hotel in Tel Aviv and the David Citadel Hotel in Jerusalem.

To register or for more information Eyal Golan:

Gilad Schalit says thank you to Toronto

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

When you first observe Gilad Schalit in person, it's a little surprising how young he looks, and frail, as if a good gust of wind would blow him over.

Graciously, he took to the stage at the Beth Tzedec Congregation Sept. 16 to thank the Toronto community for the support and prayers it gave him during his five years of captivity in Gaza. And though he's appeared at similar public events around the world, he still looks somewhat uncomfortable and awkward at all the fuss being made in his name, sort of like a fidgety bar mitzvah boy. It's amazing such a slight young man could have survived what he did.

Toward the end of the evening's proceedings, he was handed a pair of gifts by JNF Canada, which sponsored his appearance – starting with a weighty aboriginal carving, which looked like it might snap his fragile limbs with its mass.

The other memento, a Toronto Maple Leafs sweater with his name stitched on the back and bearing the number 18 – representing life – brought a broad smile to his face, as he had acknowledged that one of his passions is sports. It also drew the loudest cheer of the night in an evening that provided many occasions for the crowd of 3,000 to stand and express their support.

Schalit received a standing ovation, as did Jason Kenney, federal minister of employment, social development and multiculturalism, in appreciation of the Canadian government's steadfast support of Israel, as did Jason Kimelman.

Kimelman's moving address particularly touched the hearts of many in the crowd, which drew yet another link between Toronto's Jewish community and Schalit.

Schalit, of course, was a corporal in the Israel Defence Forces' (IDF) Armored Corps who was captured by Hamas in a 2006 cross-border raid. He was held in captivity for five years and released only when the Israeli government agreed to free 1,027 Palestinian prisoners, including many with blood on their hands, in exchange for him.

Israelis help in Nairobi mall attack

JTA

JERUSALEM — Kenyan troops, reportedly backed by Israeli agents, launched an assault to end the siege by Somali militants at a Nairobi shopping mall.

A Kenyan security source confirmed that Israelis "are rescuing the hostages and the injured" at the upscale Westgate mall, the French news agency AFP reported. The Israeli Foreign Ministry refused to confirm or deny its agents were involved in the operation, which took place shortly after nightfall on Sunday.

Kenyan President Uhuru Kenyatta had said he received "numerous offers of assistance from friendly countries" but that for now it remained a Kenyan operation.

Citing an unidentified Israel security source, Reuters had reported earlier Sunday that Israeli advisers were helping with negotiation strategy but were not involved in "any imminent storming operation."

The death toll in the attack was at least 62, with police warning that it could rise "much higher," AFP reported. Some 200 people have been injured in the attack, which began Sept. 21.

Militants from Al Shabab, a Somalia-based terror group linked to Al Qaeda, claimed responsibility for the attack.

The five-storey shopping centre features several Israeli-owned outlets, according to wire services. Among them is the Art-Caffe – the attack by eight gunmen took place near the coffee shop and bakery.

One Israeli was injured and three others escaped harm, according to Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

A ministry spokesperson said Israelis had not been specifically targeted.

Cantor Dies

LONDON, Ont. — Cantor Joseph Freiman, who served Congregation Or Shalom in London, Ont., for almost 40 years, died Sept. 7, 10 days before his 94th birthday. Freiman was born in Romania and survived the Holocaust, including time in Auschwitz. After the war, he received cantorial training in Italy and began his career in Uruguay. He and his family moved to London, where he became cantor at the Conservative Or Shalom in 1968.

Site Defames Israel

BRUSSELS — A Belgian Education Ministry website compared Israel and Nazi Germany, a Jewish newspaper reported. The comparisons were made on the KlasCement.be website, a major teaching resource offered by the Education Ministry of the Flemish Region, one of three entities comprising the federal Belgian state, the Jewish monthly Joods Actueel reported Sept. 16. The site featured an exercise with a drawing depicting a Jewish man impaled on the fence of a concentration camp next to a man wearing Arab headdress, their limbs arranged in the form of a Nazi swastika. The caption "Never Again" appears above the image of the Jew, and the words "Over Again!" are written at the Arab's right foot. It was drawn by Brazilian artist Carlos Latuff, whom the Simon Wiesenthal Center has accused of anti-Semitism. The exercise was reportedly pulled after the article appeared.

Biden To Speak

WASHINGTON — U.S. Vice-President Joe Biden will be the keynote speaker at J Street's annual conference. Also speaking at the Sept. 28-Oct. 1 parley of the liberal pro-Israel group will be Martin Indyk, chief U.S. Mideast peace negotiator. The conference will feature speakers from across the Israeli political spectrum, including from the Shas, Likud, Labor, Hatnua and Yesh Atid parties, as well as leaders from the U.S. Jewish establishment. J Street advocates an active U.S. role in bringing about a two-state solution and is critical of Israeli settlements. It refused to weigh in recently on President Barack Obama's appeal to Congress to authorize a strike on Syria's Assad regime to degrade its chemical weapons capability. The vast majority of Jewish and pro-Israel groups had backed Obama in his effort.

Rabbi Was Kabbalist To The Stars

LOS ANGELES — Rabbi Philip Berg, who brought the teachings of Kabbalah to a celebrity following that included Madonna and Britney Spears, has died.

Rabbi Philip Berg

Rabbi Berg, the founder of the Kabbalah Centre in Los Angeles, died Sept. 16 at a hospital in that city. He had been ill since suffering a stroke in 2004. He was 86.

His followers also included Demi Moore and Ashton Kutcher. Rabbi Berg had four million students in Kabbalah centres around the world.

He spurred controversy by bringing Kabbalah, a form of Jewish mysticism believed to be reserved for top Jewish scholars, to the masses. His widow, Karen, and two sons, Yehuda and Michael, have led the centre since his stroke. He founded the centre in 1969.

The U.S. Internal Revenue Service opened a tax evasion probe into the centre last year, though it's unknown if the probe is still being pursued, according to the Los Angeles Times. The centre, which is believed to have assets in the hundreds of millions, reportedly emphasized cash donations from members.

Born Shraga Feivel Gruberger in New York, he was ordained as a rabbi in 1951. He was buried Sept. 17 in the Israeli city of Safed, a centre of Jewish mysticism.

Holy Blossom dedicates tower to late teen

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Holy Blossom Temple's tower, a structure that brought mystery and a little mischief to generations of congregants, was dedicated to the memory of Jacob Hertzman earlier this month.

Jacob, a "deeply religious" little boy who was born with multiple congenital anomalies, died in 1996 at the age of 14.

Years ago, David Hertzman, Jacob's father, decided he wanted to do something special in honour of his son's short life.

"He loved the temple. When he passed away, I wanted to memorialize him there," he said.

Holy Blossom's acting senior rabbi, Yael Splansky, recalled when Hertzman first approached her about dedicating the tower in his son's memory.

But because the shul's $30-million renewal and renovation project was always just over the horizon, his idea had to wait, Rabbi Splansky explained.

"He didn't want something that had all the bells and whistles. He wanted the tower safe and clean, and he wanted it open for people to enjoy. It had been locked for decades, because the stairs weren't safe and it was being used as a [storage area]," she said, adding that the restoration of the tower was a perfect way to launch the renewal project, which is set to begin Phase 1 of construction next fall.

During her Rosh Hashanah sermon the day before the Sept. 7 dedication ceremony, Rabbi Splansky described Jacob as "a very thin boy... a bright light. A big toothy grin, and a shock of platinum blond hair, a big personality and he would dress to the nines."

She talked about the thrill he got from finding the tower door unlocked and sneaking up the rickety steps to the top of the tower, where he enjoyed a great view of the city.

"The steps are now secure, there's lighting that's been put in, new windows," she said.

The interior of the tower at Holy Blossom Temple

"But what remains are the signatures. All these decades, kids have been sneaking up there and adding their names to the wall," she added. "Now there is going to be a whole new generation of kids adding their names to the wall."

During the dedication, which drew about 600 friends, family and congregants, Jacob's father read an excerpt from The Jacob Stories, a book published by the Hertzman family to memorialize "his ceaseless string of adventures."

The Tower, written by Hertzman, describes the excitement Jacob felt when he and his father first snuck up to the top of the tower.

"We entered the narrow space. It was dark, dusty and mysterious... The windows were grimy and cracked, but that did not bother Jacob.

U.S. credibility takes a hit with shift on Syria

The staggering blanket coverage of U.S. President Barack Obama's shifting plans for dealing with Syria's Aug. 21 chemical weapons attack on its own civilians was followed by countless analyses of who emerged as "winners" and "losers" after the Russian and American "diplomatic" agreement, announced Sept. 14 in Geneva, to identify and eliminate Syria's chemical arsenal. This is the very arsenal that, until forced to admit otherwise, Syrian President Bashar Assad denied even existed.

According to Reports

PAUL MICHAELS

In his Sept. 15 Bloomberg column, Jeffrey Goldberg argued that the biggest winner was Assad himself. He's safe from armed attack by the United States (even if such a strike was to have been limited only to degrading his capacity to use chemical weapons again, not to removing him). And thus he's free to continue his onslaught against huge numbers of his civilian population. Most estimates say more than 100,000 Syrians have been killed by the regime, 98 per cent with conventional weapons.

Moreover, as Goldberg notes, "By partnering with Russia and the West on the disarmament process, a process that is meant to last into 2014 (and most likely won't be finished for years, even if it is carried out in good faith, which is a big 'if'), Assad has made himself indispensable."

Not far behind was Russian President Vladimir Putin. By brokering the deal, which provided Obama a way out of his predicament in the U.S. Congress, in effect, balking at using military force, "[Putin] has shown up an American president, and he will be considered, by the perpetually naive at least, to be something akin to a peacemaker, when, in fact, he's a bloody-minded autocrat," Goldberg wrote.

In fact, Putin runs an authoritarian system based, according to some analysts, on mafia-like rules where political opposition and investigative journalists pay a heavy price – especially, in the latter case, sometimes with their lives. Not to be forgotten is Putin's response not all that long ago to the Chechen independence struggle: during the second Chechen war (1999-2000), Russian forces killed tens of thousands of Chechens and destroyed much of the capital, Grozny, through artillery shelling and carpet-bombing. Yet this is the very Putin who dared to lecture Americans on the opinion page of the New York Times earlier this month about the need to adhere to the rule of law, foremost international law. This was the same Putin who insisted that it was the rebels – not the dictator Assad, whom Putin supports and arms – who used chemical weapons last month.

At the bottom of the list, but not out of contention, was Obama. In Goldberg's reckoning, "In the narrowest political sense, it's a victory because the president is no longer compelled to launch military strikes that the American people clearly didn't support. In a broader sense, it's a victory because, by threatening to attack, he has forced the Syrian regime to acknowledge that it does, in fact, possess chemical weapons."

While there were as many compelling arguments against limited U.S. military strikes on Syria as for them – which shows just how complicated the situation is in Syria – it was Obama's indecisiveness about the use of force that undermined his position. Obama's core decency and caution are no match for the ruthlessness of those, like Putin and Assad, who'll do whatever's required to get what they want.

The result, of course, is that it's perfectly valid to ask why Iran should take Obama seriously when he insists – as he has on many occasions – that he won't allow Iran to acquire nuclear weapons and that "all options are on the table" to make sure that doesn't happen.

On Sept. 15, Obama warned Iran not to misread his change of mind over Syria. "My suspicion is that the Iranians recognize they shouldn't draw a lesson that we haven't struck [the Assad regime] to think we won't strike Iran," he said.

In short, if there's one "loser" – in addition, that is, to the hapless and beleaguered Syrian people – it may well be America's credibility.

We, too, must fight for good

When Daniel Patrick Moynihan fought the UN's infamous "Zionism is racism" resolution as US ambassador, he telegrammed his boss, Henry Kissinger, saying that he hoped people in the future would say, "An issue of honour, of morality was put before us, and not all of us ran." Once upon a time, Canada was more well known as the land of even-handed niceness and appeasement than as a bastion of courage, especially internationally. But, in the Jewish tradition of hakarat hatov, recognizing good deeds, we should salute those who are helping to change Canada's reputation for the better.

We commend Prime Minister Stephen Harper, his foreign minister John Baird, his minister of multiculturalism Jason Kenney and others who have made it clear that Canadian decency cannot abide the indecency of the new anti-Semitism and the assault on democratic values reflected in the delegitimization of Israel.

We applaud former justice minister and current Liberal MP Irwin Cotler for a lifetime of dedication to human rights, an activist far more worthy of the Nobel Peace Prize than recent winners such as the European Union, the International Atomic Energy Agency, former U.S. vice-president Al Gore or former president Jimmy Carter, let alone former Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat.

We salute MP Maria Mourani of the Bloc Quebecois and Thomas Mulcair, leader of the NDP, among others, for standing up heroically against the absurd Parti Québécois "charter of Quebec values," which will pervert Canadian and democratic values by discriminating against devout people.

While applauding this all-party parade of courageous role models, we should look closer to home as well, challenging ourselves and each other to stand tall for what is right. As citizens in a proud democracy, just because professional politicians have done the right thing does not absolve us from leading the way, too, not just joining them and affirming their moves. Our culture tends to encourage too much passivity, and the old saw is still true – it's our civic duty to mobilize and fight for truth and justice.

Similarly as Jews, we need a lot more courage in our lives. It begins with activism against our enemies: anti-Semites, anti-Zionists and delegitimizers who threaten the peace process by questioning Israel's right to exist. But we need a different kind of courage in the Jewish world today. We need the courage to embrace tradition in a world that worships change, and to champion change when the traditional ways no longer work. Too many of us are passive Jewish consumers and not active doers or change agents in the Jewish community. Jewish life is also deeply democratic. Unless we start learning more, doing more, participating more and engaging more, our souls will wither, our communal institutions will decay and our tradition will lose its spark.

Former U.S. president John F. Kennedy often quoted Dante that "the hottest places in hell are reserved for those who, in a time of great moral crisis, maintain their neutrality."

But hot places are also reserved for those who, in a time of great opportunity to lead, grow, inspire and thrive, maintain their passivity and complacency.

The world needs fewer Beinarts

Rabbi Dow Marmur starts his encomium to Peter Beinart and other left-leaning Jewish critics of Israel with a bit of a pout ("Canadian Jewry needs a Peter Beinart" The CJN, Sept. 4). Even the Harper government's strongly pro-Israel stance is seen as an unkind blow to the "Israel is the obstacle to peace" crowd.

Beinart, though he may keep kosher (according to Rabbi Marmur), has some pretty unkosher suggestions when it comes to Israel. Beinart calls for a boycott of Israeli products made on the other side of the 1948 armistice line. But Rabbi Marmur refers to Beinart as a Zionist. It is a strange kind of Zionist who does nothing but criticize Israel, never comes to its defence, and makes common cause with its enemies.

Rabbi Marmur also pleads that "those currently on the fringe" should "be on the inside and not be shut out by 'community discipline.'" Contrast these idealistic words with Rabbi Marmur's support for trying to shut down Pamela Geller, the well-known critic of political Islam. When you contrast his attitudes toward Beinart and Geller, it is hard to avoid the conclusion that for Rabbi Marmur, criticizing Israel is good and criticizing political Islam, the fundamental cause of Arab/Muslim anti-Israel aggression, is bad.

He laments the fact that they aren't more Beinarts. I say what Israel and the world needs is fewer Beinarts and more Gellers.

Shakespeare was not a bigot

Shakespeare's masterpiece, The Merchant of Venice, is a "bigoted piece of trash," according to your very ill-informed letter writer Philip Goldig ("Play should be tossed away" The CJN, Sept. 11).

Shakespeare was no bigoted, virulent anti-Semite as Goldig claims. There is not an iota of evidence to support such a claim. Actually, very little is known of Shakespeare's life. No manuscripts of any of his plays, in his own hand are extant, which, importantly, would include his stage directions, which means that how he wished Shylock to be portrayed is completely unknown today. And Shakespeare never met a Jew, since there were none, except perhaps Jews who had converted to Christianity, in his London.

Stratford director Antoni Cimolino is not the first stage director to have his actor portray Shylock as "a whimpering degraded character," nor will he, unfortunately, be the last.

Goldig should perhaps question why the director set the play in Mussolini's Italy. Shakespeare didn't – that's for sure.

Production was best I've ever seen

After reading Philip Goldig's review of The Merchant of Venice ("Play should be tossed away" Letters, The CJN, Sept. 11) I think we must have seen two different plays. This was the best production of Merchant that I have ever seen.

I hate to disagree with Goldig's absolute certainty that Shakespeare was a "bigoted, virulent anti-Semite." In fact, I do remember Shylock's famous speech "Hath not a Jew eyes..." – the first time a Jew is portrayed as a three-dimensional, attacked human being.

Shylock is wronged, suffers, and demands extreme revenge. He is a bad person who happens to be a Jew, not the other way around. He is hurt by the rejection of his daughter and goes to the extreme. People do that all the time, but we don't blame it on their religion... or do we?

Arabs and Jews are both Israelis

I'm writing to object to the caption "Israelis and Arabs carry gas mask boxes outside a gas mask distribution centre in Haifa on Sept. 1" (The CJN, Sept. 11). What the caption should have said is: "Jews and Arabs carry gas mask boxes..." or, arguably even better (especially given that the photo was taken in Haifa): "Israelis carry gas mask boxes..." and let the photo speak for itself.

In response to any readers who might object to my objection, imagine a caption under an analogous photo in the Toronto Star that read "Jews and Canadians line up for [whatever]."

Syria's chemical weapons a concern for Israel

Alex Trainman
JNS.org

On the same day that the U.S. and Russia agreed to a deal stipulating that Syria must remove or destroy its chemical weapons stockpile by mid-2014, Israelis were happy to spend Saturday's 40th anniversary of the Yom Kippur War in synagogue and not on the battlefield or in safe rooms with gas masks.

Yet Israelis' long-term outlook on the situation in Syria isn't as rosy.

"Israelis are relieved in the short term but concerned in the long term," Mitchell Barak, an Israeli political pollster and director of Keevoon Research, told JNS.org.

"Right now, they don't have to get their gas masks ready, and it doesn't look like there is going to be war in the region right now, but we still have a long-term problem," he said.

The long-term threat for Israel, according to Barak, is that Syria officially possesses chemical weapons. Syria in August deployed chemical weapons in a bloody, two-year civil war, but the fear is that those weapons could one day be turned on the Jewish state, either by the Syrian government or by other radical groups that may get their hands on them.

"Syria has now admitted to having chemical weapons. Up until now, they were denying it. Now they're admitting it. And that doesn't sit well with Israelis," Barak said.

Syria's usage and public admission of possessing chemical weapons has garnered newfound outrage from members of the international community, yet Israel has long been aware of sophisticated weapons movements and developments by its northern neighbour.

Numerous experts have cited Syria as being a likely destination for Iraqi weaponry, evacuated prior to and during the Second Gulf War.

Israel takes weapons movements in its neighbourhood very seriously, considering any sophisticated weaponry in the region to be an existential threat.

The Israeli government has admitted to launching a successful air strike on a nuclear reactor in Syria in late 2007. More recently, Israel is believed to be behind an airstrike on a convoy of anti-aircraft weapons moving from southern Syria toward Lebanon.

Protesters outside the Russian embassy in Tel Aviv demonstrate Aug. 30 against the use of chemical weapons in Syria. [Flash90 photo]

"Israel has gone into Syria four times in the last few years to take out threats," Barak said.

As a result, many Israelis were welcoming the idea that the United States may have unilaterally succeeded in removing the Syrian weapons threat, while Israeli warplanes remained glued to their bases.

On the other hand, many Israelis hold the oft-stated position of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu that Israel can and must defend itself, by itself. The fear is that foreign military intervention can create region-wide instability and a potential host of worst-case scenarios, including a multi-front confrontation between Israel and several of its neighbours.

"We can only rely on ourselves, but Israel has a problem going at it alone in certain instances, because there will similarly be repercussions toward Israel," Barak said.

While a U.S. strike on Syrian targets may have succeeded in eliminating the weapons cache, Israelis were bracing for the potential fallout. Both Syria and Iran insisted that any U.S. strike would result in punitive attacks on Israel. And Hezbollah, which had dispatched militants from Lebanon to fight against Syrian President Bashar Assad, was likely to shift its attention back toward its favourite longtime target, Israel.

According to Barak, allowing Russia to be the guarantor of a known stockpile of weapons of mass destruction just to the north of Israel's border is not necessarily reassuring.

"The problem for Israelis is that they don't completely trust the Russians," Barak said.

"Israelis believed that the United States had what it takes to take care of the situation. Israelis are not confident that the current solution will take care of the problem," he said.

Addressing a memorial ceremony for Israeli soldiers killed in the 1973 Yom Kippur War Sept. 15, Netanyahu said, "We hope the understandings reached between the United States and Russia regarding the Syrian chemical weapons will yield results."

Netanyahu called for "the complete destruction of all of the chemical weapons stockpiles that the Syrian regime has used against its own people."

Israelis and other key U.S. allies are concerned that the U.S. is losing credibility and deterrence in the region, by not acting on its threat of military intervention if Syria were to deploy chemical weapons – a stated "red line" of U.S. President Barack Obama.

At the same time, many in Israel have questioned why the use of chemical weapons represented the crossing of a red line when the murder of more than 100,000 Syrian citizens over the past two years with conventional weapons did not. Similarly, Israelis are wondering where the red lines lie with regard to Iran's illicit nuclear program – an even greater existential threat to Israel.

In an Israel Hayom poll that was published Sept. 13, a day before the U.S. and Russia agreed to the chemical weapons deal, a majority of Israeli Jews – 66.7 per cent – characterized Obama's handling of the Syria crisis as "not successful." Meanwhile, 65.3 per cent said that given Obama's conduct regarding Syria, he would not be able to successfully deal with the Iranian nuclear program.

Netanyahu said Sept. 15 that it's "incumbent on the efforts of the international community to stop Iran's nuclear armament." He said that as is the case for the Syria crisis, for Iran "it is not words but actions that will determine the outcome."

U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry also made his latest visit to Israel last week in an attempt to convince Israeli officials that the Russian-proposed chemical weapons plan represents a strategic victory and that American deterrence remains in effect should Iran advance its nuclear ambitions.

Additionally, Kerry planned to monitor the progress of jump-started Israeli-Palestinian conflict negotiations, which have largely been taken out of the spotlight by Syria.

According to Barak, most Israelis have been ignoring the current U.S.-backed negotiations due to a lack of confidence the initiative will bring about a change in the status quo, following two decades of failed attempts. The 20th anniversary of the 1993 Oslo accords was Sept. 13.

"Israelis over the last number of years are just skeptical when it comes to the peace process. Most Israelis want peace, but are skeptical that peace will come through this process. There have been a lot of false starts, and a lot of crying wolf," Barak told JNS.org.

"I think most Israelis believe that there are more urgent and pressing matters in the Middle East right now than between Israelis and Palestinians. Compared to everything else going on in the region, there's no urgent need to solve this problem," the pollster said.

The nature of dreams

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Two men walk along the Jerusalem promenade: one is short and stocky, a former kibbutznik, the other is tall, white-haired, patrician in aspect, his clothes those of a midwestern American professor.

One is Israeli author Amos Oz, the other Sari Nusseibeh, president of Al-Quds University. They're at ease with each other. Oz jokes about his artificial knees setting off alarms in airports, bringing security down on his head.

Jerusalem sprawls in the distance. Oz: "We were both born in this city. Sari, what will become of it?"

Nusseibeh: "Well, I'm coming to believe it is a little bit overrated. We have given it far too much as human beings... But... it's certainly losing its mystical element – from my perspective as a result of how we as human beings behave towards each other." He has a wonderful Oxbridge accent.

Oz: "What drives me furious is the fact that we all know the solution... Everybody knows that this [he gestures in one direction] will be the capital of Israel and this [points the other way] will be the capital of Palestine... There will be an Israel embassy in Palestine and a Palestinian embassy in Israel... within walking distance of each other."

Nusseibeh: "It makes me angry, too, that the holy sites, the holiness of the place, our memories, our religions, are actually making us live such miserable lives and create so much pain to each other. Once again I say we keep forgetting the human side, the human element, for the sake of rocks and places."

This dialogue is part of a TV documentary titled Amos Oz: the Nature of Dreams.

Oz has dreamed much for his native land, dreamt of peace, only to see it recede into the far future.

The two discuss the refugee issue.

Nusseibeh: "People have often assumed on the Arab side that not to address the refugee problem... is in itself a good thing, but I think it is an immoral thing to do. Imagine how many children are being born today in the refugee camps in Syria, Jordan who do not have any chances, any hope for a life that's decent. All because people are hoping the past can be brought back to life."

Oz: "This is the inscription I would inscribe on the skies over east Jerusalem and west Jerusalem alike: 'The past cannot be brought back alive.' [Israelis and Palestinians] both have this disease about restoring the past."

Nusseibeh: "The future is more interesting than the past. The future is still all the things we can do – you know, human beings can make their history... I believe in political miracles."

Oz responds: "I would like to have the role of sound technician in the talks. I would give the sound technician an instruction to disconnect the mikes each time one of the negotiators is referring to the past, only to plug it in when they talk about the present and the future."

One says, "We need to come here more often." The other replies, "Let's do it – without the cameras."

By the time you read this, we'll be finishing the most solemn period of the Jewish year, while fires in Syria threaten the tenuous stability of the Middle East – a stability based on fear of other possibilities. Can this dialogue between Palestinian and Israeli be relevant as we approach the end of the High Holiday season?

Rabbi Alan Lew in This is Real and You Are Completely Unprepared, a meditation on the High Holidays, writes, "It is precisely those who insist on remembering history who are prepared to repeat it." For him, the cycle of the holidays from Tisha b'Av to Yom Kippur is the time to change direction, write a new history for our future – maybe not in the Middle East, but certainly for ourselves.

At Slichot this year, our rabbi (a child of Holocaust survivors) and a professor of New Testament studies (a child of committed Nazi parents) talked about reconciliation, forgiveness and memory. How much history had to be committed before these two men could reconcile their family histories and consign memories to the past?

Each one had to create a new story about themselves, their families, and how they would like their lives to depart from the old stories.

We all have stories we like to tell ourselves. Can we change them for the new year?

Two stories to start the new year

Norma Raumel Joseph in Montreal

Facing the new year requires some amount of determination to be able to begin with a sense of balance, with an ability to merge both the feelings of pessimism and optimism that naturally assail us.

It's difficult to be positive listening to the news. We're surrounded by negative happenings. Bad things and crises are the love children of the news media. Add to that our own Jewish communal leadership, which feeds on negative predictions of demographers and sociologists, since they believe these foster closer communal ties and better philanthropic conditions. (I disagree on both counts.)

On the other hand, if one espouses only positive thoughts, we'd be deigned foolish, since reality doesn't align well with such dreams. Moreover, people don't exactly enjoy such discussions and tend to avoid alliances.

My husband taught that we should walk in the world with two slips of paper in our pockets. One should state: "For me the world was created." On the other should be written: "I am but dust and ashes." With those two concepts carried forward, we might have a chance at harmony in our lives.

I think we need balance, but a special kind, one that leans toward optimism.

Let me tell you two stories. Taking care of a special-needs person has brought me into contact with many aspects of our society and many different types of reactions. I was appalled at the abrupt way we were discharged from the rehabilitation hospital without adequate preparation or guidance. Many things about that time and subsequent neglectful conditions have amazed me. They could have left me angry, and sometimes did. So here come two crazy opposite stories that have, overall, left me smiling and very positive.

We flew to Denver to see my daughter in her new home. My husband was joyous, as the trip went very well until we came home. Air Canada, with its monopoly on direct flights, had lost his wheelchair – twice! It's breathtaking. They left it on the bridge in Denver as the plane took off. No one there panicked, thinking, "Oh my God! Someone must need this!" No, it was just left there, until we noticed that we couldn't get off the plane in Montreal. Eventually, hours later, at the delayed luggage counter (lovely euphemism), they found it. It was flown home quickly, but we didn't receive it, because no one put a tag on it to deliver it to us. So it sat in Trudeau Airport, lost again. Meanwhile, there's resource to loan us a wheelchair, but it takes 24 hours to get to us. How was I supposed to get my husband home? Don't ask. It was a terrible experience that will inhibit future trips. Sadly, I'm now afraid to travel, and my husband wants to visit his children.

But here's a good story. We had a ramp put in for the wheelchair. The CLSC social worker didn't feel it was safe enough, especially in the winter. She was correct. She helped me apply to the Quebec government's Programme D'Adaptation de Domicile. A wonderful agent came to the house and immediately agreed. She put us on her priority list. In every way, our experience with this department was overwhelmingly positive. I spoke English and they helped me in every way, translating any document I couldn't understand. There was a lot of paperwork. I was helped with it every inch of the way.

The design of the lift was prepared. A list of contractors was sent to me. I chose four to call for estimates. I received responses and chose one because he spoke English. The government representative agreed that was a good reason. The lift is very expensive, but the government paid 4/5 of the cost. Once all the parties agreed and everything was signed, it took four days to install. The men who worked were kind, efficient and capable. When my husband wanted to go out, they carried him and his wheelchair over the steps until the lift was working. It's completed, and I'm proud of the way this department worked with me to enable my husband easy access to the world outside.

Things can work, even in Quebec, even in English. So I can see a way forward, with a touch of optimistic thinking.

Syria's civil war seen as posing grave threat

Israel likely to act alone versus Iran: analyst

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Israel faces dangers on a number of fronts, but according to Washington-based security analyst Clifford May, not all perils are created equal.

Hamas, he said, presents Israel with a tactical threat; Hezbollah, with 60,000 missiles at its disposal, poses a strategic threat, and Iran, with its program of nuclear armament and repeated threats of genocide from its leaders, poses an existential threat to the Jewish state.

It's a threat that at one point during the Obama administration, Israel had hoped it would not have to face alone. But given recent developments in Syria, where the United States set a "red line" on chemical weapons and then backed away from it, Israelis are convinced that in the end, they'll have to deal with Iran alone.

May presented a rather pessimistic evaluation of the current situation in the Middle East as part of Honest Reporting Canada's Insider Briefing Series. May, the president of the Foundation for the Defense of Democracies, an organization founded following the 9/11 attacks, likened the current geopolitical situation to Europe in the 1930s.

There's Islamic scripture cited by radical Muslims to support their goal of a Middle East without Israel, with "only Muslims of a certain stripe" and of a region in which Islam must dominate, he said.

The Syrian civil war poses a grave threat to Israel, May said. If Syrian President Bashar Assad prevails, then "Iran triumphs. Syria becomes a province of Iran." Hezbollah also wins and will prevail in Lebanon, and Hamas will come under the Iranian umbrella. It would mean Iranian hegemony in the Middle East and the withdrawal of the United States.

The prevailing view in Washington policy corridors is that "if the United States won't defend this red line [in Syria] it won't defend the red line in Iran."

For their part, Israeli leaders believe "we are really on our own."

May said that by mid-2014, Iran is expected to acquire the nuclear capability that "would make it difficult to deal with it." To prevent Iranian nuclear capabilities, Israel will have to act within that time frame, and the best that can be expected of the United States is political and diplomatic support, plus re-supply, he suggested.

The United States under former president George W. Bush did not have a good strategy, but its war on terrorism was at least the right approach, he said.

Under the Obama administration, U.S. officials won't even acknowledge a "war on terrorism," choosing instead to use the term, "overseas contingency operations," he added.

The United States has withdrawn militarily from Iraq and is doing so from Afghanistan. It won't connect the dots between events in these countries and Syria and Mali, May said.

You have to have a strategy and goals, but "I don't see what our strategy is," he added.

May suggested the United States must learn from western leaders in World War II, who set a goal that went beyond military victory to defeat, discredit and delegitimize opposing ideologies.

Like Communism and Nazism, Islamism is a supremacist creed, he argued. "We have to wage a war against supremacist ideologies."

In a question period, May was asked whether an honest discussion about Islamic expansionism, on campus and elsewhere, was being inhibited by self-censorship and accusations of Islamophobia.

"Islamophobia is a kind of jiujitsu," May replied.

Criticism of Islamic supremacy is called Islamophobia, while at the United Nations, the Organization of Islamic Cooperation, formerly the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC), is pushing to ban criticism of Islam, he said.

"We're being fought with warfare, 'lawfare' and 'jawfare' – the whole idea of turning it around so that any frank discussion is one that can't be done in polite conversation."

An emotional welcome for an unlikely hero

Lila Sarick
CJN Staff

It can be hard sometimes to wrap our arms around the messy, contradictory, miraculous and mundane State of Israel. But it was easy for my family to wrap our arms around the skinny shoulders of Gilad Schalit.

Guest Voice

When my kids and I visited Israel a few years ago, we stopped by the protest tent his parents had set up outside the prime minister's house. Truth be told, it felt like making a shivah call.

We bought T-shirts bearing his solemn face and tied bits of coloured ribbon on our knapsacks. We shook hands with Gilad's father, and in my halting, stilted Hebrew, I told him that we in the Diaspora hadn't forgotten his son, that we were praying for his boy.

And we were.

We set a place for Gilad at our seder, a plate and an empty chair at a crowded table, to remember the Jew who wasn't there, who at the very best, was wasting away in a Hamas-created hell.

My teenage sons, just a few years younger than Gilad, and our guests debated the ethics of trading one soldier for hundreds of terrorists, murderers with blood on their hands, men who would potentially kill innocents again.

"What are they talking politics for?" asked an elderly guest.

"Dad, they're talking Torah, they're discussing pidyon shvuyim," the obligation to ransom captives, explained his daughter.

And then came the amazing day when Gilad emerged from Gaza, not in a coffin like so many other Israeli POWs, but on his own unsteady legs, blinking as he surfaced from the darkness.

It was not surprising then, that I took my kids to hear Gilad speak when he came to Toronto last week.

"You know, Gilad made a lot of mistakes when he was captured. We learned about it at camp," said my 13-year-old daughter. "But I still think we should go hear him."

And so last week, we stood with 3,000 other Jews and gave Gilad a heartfelt standing ovation.

But sometimes the emotional punch to the gut comes when you least expect it. For me, it was not hearing Gilad speak.

It was deeply satisfying to see him healthy, worlds away from the pale and emaciated soldier released two years ago.

He looked younger than I expected and ill at ease. He remains an unlikely icon, a man reluctantly thrust into the vortex of politics and publicity. But he was gracious in thanking us for remembering and praying and advocating for him during his captivity. And he persevered, stumbling through his 10-minute speech, much of which sounded as if someone else had written it.

But the emotional kick came from an unexpected quarter, from the bravery of Jason Kimelman, whose sister, Marnie, was killed in an explosion on a Tel Aviv beach 23 years ago.

I had completely forgotten the gut-wrenching local twist to the story – that one of the terrorists accused of murdering the Toronto teenager was included in the ransom for Gilad Schalit.

It was agonizing for Jason and his family to realize that the man who had murdered Marnie would soon be free, but their compassion was boundless.

I felt tears welling up as Jason described the day he learned his sister's murderer was to be included in the prisoner swap. And how his family, after some reflection, reached into some hidden depth to give their blessing to the deal, to allow Gilad to walk free of blame or guilt.

Marnie's sunny smile, a girl forever 17, was projected on screens around the synagogue, as her brother spoke. Gilad had volunteered to serve in the IDF, the family reasoned. And if they could help bring him home, they would.

In the end, controversies aside, we witnessed some amazing things. We saw a young soldier literally return from the dead. We heard him say he will never forget his five years of captivity, but he will be starting university soon. And we saw a man who suffered a grievous loss give his blessing to that soldier.

It was an evening where we saw that heroism comes in many forms. Not a bad night's outing.

Schalit's release was heatedly debated in Israel

Among those released was Yasser Hijazi, who had been tried and convicted for the 1990 murder of a Toronto teenager enjoying the sun on a Tel Aviv beach. The 17-year-old girl killed by an exploding pipe bomb was Marnie Kimelman, Jason's sister.

Hijazi was a member of Izzedine al-Qassam Brigade, the military wing of Hamas.

As Jason told the story, a friend in Israel informed him by email that Marnie's killer was being released as part of the deal to free Schalit.

"Obviously, I was shocked and upset," Jason said.

In Israel, Schalit's release was heatedly debated, with many arguing against releasing killers with blood on their hands.

When they heard the news, the Kimelman family met to discuss the issue. Their conclusion: "This was and is the right thing to do. This was the only thing to do. In the end, Israel had no choice but to bring Gilad home and ensure he was safe," Jason said.

In that, the Kimelman family was being consistent with Jewish tradition.

Earlier, Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, spiritual leader of Beth Tzedec, explained that the Talmud considers pidyon shvuyim, the freeing of captives, to be a great mitzvah.

As Kimelman expressed it, "If my brother is in trouble and needed my help, there is nothing I wouldn't do – nothing.

"From where I stand, we are Jews, and from an early age, I was told to do the right thing. Here the right thing was to bring our own brother home."

Schalit, who was the only captured Israeli soldier to be freed in 26 years, stood before the applauding crowd and said he was honoured and humbled by the experience.

He had been living a normal life in northern Israel when he was inducted into the IDF. He volunteered for a fighting unit and felt that "it was an honour to serve my country and my people."

He had expected to conclude his service, go to university and get married – in short, to lead a normal life.

He "never imagined" being captured and held, he said.

He learned only later of the way his situation had galvanized Jewish communities around the world, and he told the Toronto audience he was grateful that "you never forgot about me."

Although not a religious Jew, he appreciated the prayers for his release and the principle that "all Israel is responsible for one another. It is one of the highest values in Judaism."

The prayers and support gave his parents strength to get through a difficult period, he said. Schalit also thanked Prime Minister Stephen Harper "for everything Canada did to advocate on my behalf."

Today, he said, his life could not be considered normal. When he's out, people come up to him to have their pictures taken with him. In the shuk, merchants rush over to ply him with food.

Last year, he indulged his passion and covered the NBA finals for the Israeli newspaper Yediot Achronot, "which was a fantastic experience."

His plans for the future include studying economics and sustainability – new challenges in his life.

He concluded by thanking everyone and saying how touched he was by the outpouring of support on his behalf.

Kenney, the evening's keynote speaker, cited Kimelman in saying the prisoner exchange that freed Schalit wasn't a sign of Israeli weakness, but of its strength and "moral courage."

It demonstrated a proposition upon which Israel was founded – "the sacred principle of the inviolate dignity of the human person created in the image of God," he said.

Israel, he continued, respects the sacredness of human life "in the midst of a culture of death."

Canada has stood with Israel, even when it was politically disadvantageous to do so, "because we understand that Israel alone in the Middle East stands for civilization."

Canada and Israel share those same values, Kenney added.

Among those taking in the proceedings were dignitaries from all levels of government, including Liberal leader Justin Trudeau and Israeli Consul General DJ Schneeweiss.

Schalit was scheduled to speak in Montreal, Calgary and Vancouver. His Toronto appearance marked the kick-off of this year's 65th Negev campaign, which culminates Dec. 1 with the Negev Dinner in honour of Harper. That dinner is in support of the Stephen Harper Hula Valley Visitor and Education Centre.

Canadian Tire picketed for carrying Israeli product

Jordan Adler
Special to The CJN

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs is encouraging supporters of Israel to buy SodaStream drink makers and flavoured syrup at Canadian Tire stores as a way to combat a boycott of the Israeli-made products.

CIJA issued a "buycott" alert on Sept. 17 to thwart supporters of the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) campaign against Israel who were planning to picket an Ontario Canadian Tire store, which turned out to be a location in Hamilton four days later.

Organizations including Hamilton Coalition to Stop the War (HCSW), Canadians for Peace and Justice in the Middle East (CPJME) and the Palestinian Association of Hamilton (PAH) said they want that Canadian Tire location to stop selling the drink-maker's products after its current inventory runs out, something organizers say some other stores have promised.

Counter-protesters buy $600 in merchandise
See cjnews.com

The anti-Israel protesters were met by a counter-protest led by London, Ont., resident Mark Vandermaas, a non-Jewish supporter of Israel and a former Canadian Forces peacekeeper in the Middle East. Vandermaas told CJN correspondent Abigail Cukier that he was joined by Hindus, Muslims, Christians and Jews. Each side had about 20 to 30 people show up in the pouring rain.

In support of CIJA's "buycott" call, the counter-protesters ended their rally by buying more than $600 worth of SodaStream products. Vandermaas said he hopes the store manager will now feel more confident about carrying the product.

The "buycott" aims to support Israeli companies targeted by the BDS campaign, said Sara Saber-Freedman, executive vice-president of CIJA.

"Our objective here is to send a real simple message, which is that when people attempt to boycott Israeli products, the consequence will be that more of that product will be sold… that Israel will get more favourable attention," Saber-Freedman says

SodaStream machines can make soda water from ordinary tap water, while consumers can also buy a variety of flavoured syrups to create a carbonated soft drink. The company's headquarters and three of its 13 production facilities are in Israel.

The largest factory is located near Ma'ale Adumim, a West Bank settlement, and the majority of the employees at the facility are Palestinian Arabs who work alongside Jewish Israelis.

The Palestinian workers receive Israeli-standard wages and benefits, Saber-Freedman said.

"The way you build peace is by building economic opportunity," Saber-Freedman said. "It's not clear to me how the [Palestinians workers'] lives will be improved if that factory were to close, as I imagine the boycotters hope that it would."

Boycotters argue that SodaStream is an unethical company, since its products are manufactured in an Israeli settlement in the occupied West Bank. The boycott, divestment and sanctions campaign against Israel claims that the company's profits benefit the Israeli economy and development of illegal settlement in the West Bank and do not provide Palestinians with equal labour protection.

"It's been documented that Palestinians working for Israeli businesses that are established in the West Bank are not protected by Israeli labour laws," says Thomas Woodley, president of advocacy group Canadians for Justice and Peace in the Middle East.

"[Palestinian workers] are less willing to speak out or claim their rights. They are easily fired. Would they prefer another employment? Absolutely," Woodley says.

A promotional video released by SodaStream, however, says Palestinian Arabs at the factory are building peaceful relationships with their Israeli co-workers.

Canadian Tire is one of 50,000 retailers in 42 countries who carry SodaStream products. A Canadian Tire spokesperson wrote in an email that the company is "committed to ethical business practices here in Canada and internationally."

Sears and Hudson's Bay also sell SodaStream products. In April, a similar protest against the company at a Halifax Planet Organic retailer went largely unnoticed and only attracted a dozen boycotters.

Anne Mirvish dies at 94

Anne Lazar Mirvish, wife of the late "Honest Ed" Mirvish, died Sept. 20 at age 94.

A native of Hamilton, Ont., she was married to Ed Mirvish for 65 years until his death in 2007.

Mirvish was a sculptor who was devoted to the arts, including theatre and opera. A Mirvish spokesperson said she had inspired her husband's love of the theatre and had coaxed him into attending.

He later bought the Royal Alexandra Theatre and saved it from demolition. Mirvish Productions is now Canada's largest live-theatre company.

Her funeral was held Sept. 23 at Holy Blossom Temple.

Regesh celebrates 30 years helping at-risk youth

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

When 19-year-old Jason was in his early teenage years, he was having trouble with anger management. He spoke to several counsellors, trying to find the right one to help him.

Finally, he found support in Ed Schild, executive director of Regesh, an organization that works with at-risk youth.

"It was pretty helpful," said Jason, who, years later, still recalls and uses the skills he learned from Schild. "[I learned] how to deal with anger… breaking it down and figuring out ways to deal with it."

Jason is just one of the thousands of people Regesh has helped over its 30-year run. At the beginning, the organization provided residential services – foster and group homes, but for the past decade, it has shifted its focus to outpatient programs.

"The world keeps changing. It's difficult for kids to be kids these days, and difficult to parent the kids," said Schild, who founded the organization in 1983. "A lot of kids are very unhappy, and parents have trouble dealing with it and keeping their kids safe."

He said lots of schools are trying to offer programming for their students, but it isn't enough to help the many students dealing with difficult home lives and issues like anger management.

Participants in the Regesh summer program

He and his 12 staff members believe that every child should have access to help – most referrals are seen within two to three weeks, as opposed to the six-to-eight-month wait often found at other agencies, Schild said.

The 30th anniversary celebrations will unfold on Oct. 1 at the Japanese Canadian Cultural Centre with a gala that includes a performance by Zero Gravity Circus and features Newstalk 1010 host John Tory as MC.

"I went out to see this Reconnecting Youth program at the R. H. King Academy in Toronto, and I was absolutely blown away by it," Tory said.

Reconnecting Youth is a high-school credit class that helps students in small groups learn coping mechanisms and other life skills. The Regesh website lists three goals for the program: increase school performance, decrease drug involvement and decrease suicide-risk behaviour.

Tory described seeing two groups of kids in the classroom – those who were just starting in the program and those who had been through it for some time. The people who had just begun their experience seemed "uncertain, quieter, looking like, in some respects, they'd rather not be there."

But the kids who had been in the program for awhile said they, too, had begun the program the same way.

Tory described the kids as genuinely enthusiastic and ambitious.

"I am a believer based on the exposure to that program alone," he said, adding that it's a perfect example of how this type of charity and program should be run. "This is the best one I've seen in terms of the unbridled enthusiasm of the kids who went through it."

It's not about visiting the office for 45 minutes and leaving, Schild said, explaining that this is what makes Regesh so successful. "We walk the walk with them. Whatever they need, it's provided here."

For more information and to purchase tickets to the Oct. 1 gala, visit regesh.com.

Tour for Humanity travels across Ontario

High-tech bus promotes tolerance

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The Tour for Humanity, an ambitious project that can be compared to no other, will help the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies (FSWC) bring its message of tolerance, inclusivity, justice and human rights to millions of Ontarians.

A "mobile tolerance education centre," The Tour for Humanity, is a $1-million, retrofitted, 42-foot Fleetwood bus that has been re-engineered to accommodate a 32-seat theatre.

This initiative, for which FSWC has raised $2.4 million, is designed to bring its educational programs beyond the Greater Toronto Area to the entire province of Ontario.

FSWC president and CEO Avi Benlolo said that while his organization offers classes about tolerance and social justice issues at their Yonge Street offices, there are many people living outside of Toronto to whom the classes aren't accessible.

"We thought about building a museum in the hope that people would come. Drawing people from outlying areas is a difficult problem," Benlolo said, adding that small Ontario communities including Stratford, St. Jacobs, Orangeville and Dundas are underserved when it comes to programming that promotes tolerance and inclusivity.

Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center president and CEO Avi Benlolo, left, Ontario Progressive Conservative Leader Tim Hudak and NDP Leader Andrea Horwath, visit the new Tour for Humanity bus.

"The question was, how can we really project our influence much further and get to more people? The answer seemed quite clear: we take our program to them."

The Tour for Humanity will travel from town to town to offer workshops for students, educators and law enforcement representatives on topics including the Holocaust, genocide, bullying, heroes and leadership.

"There is no mobile training centre like this anywhere else," Benlolo boasted. "We completely retrofitted and re-engineered most of it."

The mobile centre features an interactive film that will sync up with iPads. There will be a question and answer component in which students will be prompted to answer questions on the iPads and a program will tabulate their responses.

"We also built in a lift to make it wheelchair accessible because we're all about inclusivity. The first person to have used the lift is the lieutenant-governor of Ontario, David Onley."

Onley – along with Ontario PC Leader Tim Hudak, NDP Leader Andrea Horwath, and Ontario Premier Kathleen Wynne – was on hand earlier this month to launch the initiative with a ribbon-cutting ceremony.

Onley applauded FSWC for developing a community outreach project that can both educate and inspire.

"That's when learning is most effective – when it illuminates and guides who we are… It can change lives," he said.

Benlolo said that although more than $2 million has already been raised, FSWC will continue to raise funds to sustain the project for years to come.

"We've had an incredible amount of people who have pledged to finance it," he said, adding that the Ontario Trillium Foundation gave FSWC a $500,000 grant, with the rest of the funds coming from private donors.

"They love the idea and they are helping."

FSWC board of governors member Dorothy Shoichet, whose family donated funds to realize this ambitious project, said it's the most creative educational tool she's ever seen.

"It is an exciting opportunity to get to young minds before they become corrupted by myth and rumour… I'm convinced it's going to change the world – first Ontario, and then the world," Shoichet said.

She predicted that once people learn about this initiative, other organizations will want to follow suit, and she also anticipates that when more funds become available, FSWC will buy and retrofit more buses to give the project a wider reach.

Shoichet, who called her first time on the bus a thrilling, "life-changing experience," said that for this initiative, the possibilities are endless.

"It's the beginning of the end of racism. I don't make that statement carelessly. It's the end of racism and anti-Semitism, first in Ontario, then in Canada, then North America and hopefully the world."

Benlolo said sensitivity training is very much needed, considering the prevalence of bullying and incidents such as the one that involved students at Saint Mary's University in Halifax who were caught on tape singing a chant that promoted non-consensual sex with underage girls earlier this month.

"Communities want these kinds of programs to respond to these incidents."

Benlolo expects that the bus will make its first trip in October. Those who would like to see the bus can come to Dundas Square on Sept. 25 for FSWC's annual Freedom Day celebration, where the mobile tolerance centre will be parked.

Old-school upholsterer retires after 65 years

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — After over 65 years in business, upholsterer Ted Muller's list of satisfied customers is a who's who of the leading families in Winnipeg, both in the Jewish and larger communities.

Among those who have called on him for his services are the Richardson family – the city's first family of business and philanthropy – retired senator Sharon Carstairs, former lieutenant governor Pearl McGonigal, the Aspers, the Spivaks and many more. Many of these people, Muller says, became lifelong friends.

On Aug. 27, many of those longtime customers and friends dropped in to Muller's Art Upholstering one final time to say goodbye to Muller and his wife and partner, Marie.

It is not that Muller, who is 87, wanted to retire. But a mild heart attack at the end of July convinced him that the time had come.

Ted Muller has been doing upholstering since he was 12 years old.

"Today, they would call it child labour," he says. "Back then, it was called an apprenticeship."

Muller's father was a harness maker and upholsterer in their native Transylvania. "I had an uncle in the business, too," he says.

"He trained me in the art of fabric."

Muller came to Winnipeg in 1948 after losing his parents in the Holocaust.

"I arrived late one evening and, by the next morning, I had a job at GIII (a bedding company operated by the Globerman family)," he recalls. "Skilled upholsterers were in great demand."

After a few months, he went into business for himself under the Art Upholstering and Draperies banner. His first workshop was his garage at home. For the first year, he recalls, he often built furniture right in customers' living rooms.

A year after coming to Winnipeg, Muller met his wife, Marie, a Holocaust survivor from Paris. Although they spoke different languages, upholstery brought them together. Her father had also been an upholsterer.

They were married in 1950.

"We have had our ups and downs," including a fire three years ago that destroyed their previous building, Marie recalls. "It was a struggle particularly in the early years."

Over time, Muller developed a sterling reputation for his work. His corporate clients included Eaton's and Hudson's Bay, the Centennial Concert Hall (for which he did the drapes) and numerous hotels and theatres.

Muller could do anything and everything with fabric and wood, but his specialty was restoring antique furniture. In that category, he has done a lot of work for Parks Canada.

Attention to detail was everything, so the process would take hours. He said that a typical foam-cushioned dining room chair in a typical house would take him half an hour to recover. Back then, with home furniture often imported from Europe, a chair stuffed with horsehair and specific stitching on the fabric would take him two days to refurbish.

"Plus you had to take pictures of it as you were taking it apart, so that when you put it back together, there were no shortcuts," he said. "You couldn't get away with shortcuts.

"Not too many people are trained to do real upholstery any more," he says.

For a number of years, he would make chairs for Na'amat to raffle off at fundraisers.

Their daughter, Laya Kneller, organized the retirement party for them, and she and her daughter, Sky, have been helping tie up loose ends.

Ted Muller said that in retirement, he would like to go to Israel one more time to see family there.

The Mullers also have a son, Marvin, in Winnipeg and other grandchildren in Winnipeg and Toronto.

Educational and theatrical journey
This fun, energetic program allows children to explore their creative minds. The fundamentals of theatre performance and production, such as speech, role-playing, and character development will be practiced. Toward the second half of the program, participants will apply their theatrical technique to a performance that will showcase their craft and talent to the community.
Success on stage helps performers develop valuable life skills, such as the ability to deliver effective oral presentations, approach social situations with poise and confidence, and meet challenges with self-discipline.
Each child's potential is developed while she/he experiences the thrill of accomplishment and the joy of being part of a team. This program will further encourage group trust, co-operation and enjoyment, while inspiring a positive self image in the performers.

Jewish school enrolment steady in Winnipeg

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For the 2013 school year, overall Jewish school enrolment numbers in Winnipeg are much the same as last year, but the distribution is somewhat different.

The Hebrew bilingual program at Brock Corydon Public School has registered an increase of 20 students, while at the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education's program.

The major difference this year, Paul said, is that the school lost 20 students because their families left Winnipeg. He attributed the loss to immigrant families from Israel or Argentina who moved elsewhere to further parental careers.

Paul said that this year the board has introduced a new fee structure following a two-year study. The WBJE has always billed parents on a sliding scale tied to income and number of kids enrolled. Full tuition for a single student has been raised to $9,900 from $8,400. He said tuition has also been raised for parents who have paid the minimum tuition over the years, but parents with two or more children at the school will be paying less this year.

Gray Academy

While Gray Academy's enrolment has declined for the first time in four years, Brock Corydon's numbers are up for the first time in three years. Enrolment this year is 150, up from 122 last year. Until 2010, enrolment was always at 180 – or full capacity.

Brock Corydon School is in the Winnipeg One School Division. Former Brock Corydon principal Ira Udow reported last year that student enrolment was down as a whole in the school division.

"A number of our families have left the city," he said, "and many of the immigrant families are settling in areas of the city outside the Winnipeg One School Division catchment area."

He added that most of the city's newly arrived Israeli families – many of them of Russian origin – are sending their kids to regular public schools

"We are very happy with our numbers for this year," says current principal Ara Morris.

Brock Corydon is one of two Hebrew bilingual elementary school programs in the public school system. But the original (WBJE) Gray Academy of Jewish Education, enrolment is down by 15.

Rory Paul, head of school and CEO of Gray Academy, said that although the school welcomed 85 new students this year, enrolment is just 590, compared to 605 last year. This is the first time since 2009 that the school population has dropped. (In 2009, enrolment reached a nadir of 572.)

The kindergarten-to-Grade 12 school always loses some students every year after grades 6 and 9, as some students switch to public school or other non-Jewish private schools, or (for older students) attend the University of Winnipeg's high school program, at Margaret Park School in the Seven Oaks School Division in north Winnipeg, is not expected to survive.

With the significant Jewish demographic shift over the past 15 to 20 years from north Winnipeg – where the majority of the Jewish population was once located – to south Winnipeg and elsewhere, the number of Jewish students in north Winnipeg has decreased substantially.

The Margaret Park program at its peak had 180 students enrolled, but this year there are only 26. There's no kindergarten class this year – it's been a struggle for several years to recruit more than a half dozen students for it – and the plan is to phase out the other classes over the next five years, if the program even lasts that long.

Que. charter may change

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — After a week of widespread criticism and a demonstration by thousands in the streets of Montreal, the Parti Québécois government is indicating that its proposed charter of Quebec values is not written in stone.

On Sept. 17, International Relations Minister Jean-François Lisée said at a news conference that the government is open to modifying the plan before tabling a bill to the National Assembly.

Lisée, who is also responsible for Montreal and anglophones, said input from the public will be taken into account.

"We're looking for ways to improve the proposal," he said. "We're listening... We're asking people to participate and we'll take these [opinions] into consideration."

However, Lisée defended the proposed charter as "modern and progressive" and the banning of religious symbols in the public service as necessary.

"We support religious freedom. The debate we're having is about the neutrality of the state – nothing else."

The charter would ban on "overt and conspicuous" religious attire and would apply to all employees of ministries and government organizations, provincial and municipal; judges, police officers, prosecutors and correctional agents; staff of the Centres de la petite enfance (CPEs) and subsidized private daycares, public school boards, cegep and universities, and public health care and social services.

Meanwhile, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) is asking members of the Jewish community to sign a "Manifesto for an Inclusive Quebec," a petition opposing the charter.

Drafted by academics and professionals from across the professional spectrum, this non-partisan manifesto "sets out a principled critique" of the government's plan, which CIJA endorses.

About 19,000 Quebecers have already signed the document, which states that the proposed charter "would force minorities to choose between their conscience and their survival... Quebec identity is not built upon the rejection of the other."

Reform congregation creates quilts for Israel

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — More than 550 babies in Israel have been given symbolic "hugs" by a small group of volunteers from Temple Israel, Ottawa's only Reform congregation.

Each of these lucky babies has been covered by, or wrapped up in, his or her very own, new, specially designed and sewn baby quilt. There is no direct connection between the donors and recipients and most will never meet, but the donor's hands have touched the fabric which in turn touches the child, and somehow the warmth stretches over the ocean and across the miles.

As do many such projects, this one began and grew in a very roundabout way. In 2008, retired teachers and Temple Israel members Patsy Royer and Merle Haltrecht-Matte spearheaded a group of volunteers who created a quilted wall hanging to commemorate the congregation's 40th anniversary. After many hours of work – most of it fun – the quilters wanted to continue.

"At the end of the project, I thought 'Now what will we do?'" said Haltrecht-Matte.

Wanting to try something smaller than the one extremely large wall hanging, they came up with the idea of baby quilts.

"To celebrate Israel's 60th anniversary, we would spend the year making 60 baby quilts," she said. "Then we would have to find places that would take baby quilts and find people to take them and deliver them. We wanted to give them to families that we felt needed a hug from Canada... not poor families necessarily, but people who had been affected by terrorism."

They initially designated families in Sderot, Ashdod and Ashkelon to receive the quilts. Volunteers were recruited to take quilts to Israel when they travelled, to meet up with people in Israel who would distribute them.

Five years later, Royer and Haltrecht-Matte meet weekly in a little house beside the temple, which is piled high with donated fabrics and supplies in various stages of production. They're occasionally joined by other volunteers, but these two dynamos are the team leaders and take pride in their work.

Delivery has been streamlined as well, with volunteers Jane and Martin Gilbert taking quilts with them on their frequent visits to their son, who lives in Ra'anana.

Why do they continue with such a labour-intensive project that has long since surpassed its initial goal?

"I love to sew, I love to design quilts and I love to teach," said Royer. "Creating small quilts out of our many fabrics lets me do a real mitzvah, according to the thank you letters we have received, while using my creative side and learning new techniques."

Diane Koven holds a baby quilt.

16-year-old law cited as reason for change

Jewish clubs nixed at Montreal high schools

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The English Montreal School Board (EMSB) is citing a 16-year-old law to explain why extracurricular Jewish clubs at three of its high schools aren't being permitted this fall after having run for as long as five years.

But it appears that promotional efforts by the school board itself about the programs may have alerted board leaders to their existence and led to their cancellation.

The clubs, which met at lunchtime and were open to all students, were led by Rabbi Dovid Pearlstein at Royal West Academy in Montreal West, Westmount High School and Royal Vale High School in Notre Dame de Grâce.

Rabbi Pearlstein, who has been involved for about three years, said he was abruptly told at the end of the last school year (earlier in the case of Westmount) that he could not continue coming to the schools because of Bill 180.

That's the act to amend the Education Act passed in 1997, reforming the public school system after the abolition of denominational school boards and the reorganization of schools under French and English boards.

He was told that the law forbids religious instruction in public schools.

Carolyn Gehr, a Royal West math and science teacher, directed the club at her school. She's on maternity leave this year, but brought the club ban to the attention of The CJN. She believes a CJN article last March helped spur the move.

"Partially as a result of this article, the EMSB has now banned these clubs in all their schools, saying it is in contravention of Bill 180 regarding religious neutrality in schools," she wrote in a letter.

EMSB spokesperson Michael Cohen acknowledged that a press release his department issued about the popularity of the Royal West Jewish club last spring, and the resulting exposure in the media, including The CJN, may have had something to do with the EMSB's decision.

"There was a disconnect somewhere… I imagine this was going on without the full knowledge of the administration," he said.

"It slipped under the radar… It's a big school, 900 students. This appears to have been the students' initiative with a rabbi volunteering to come in to talk to them… The PR we did probably made [the administration] aware of it."

Rabbi Pearlstein, who is associated with the Chabad-Lubavitch organization's Chai Centre, said he received permission from the principals of each of the schools before he began the clubs. Although the primary goal was to strengthen Jewish students' connection to their roots, Rabbi Pearlstein insists he gave no religious instruction as such. He said he focused on ethical issues and worked within the guidelines of the school. There was talk about Jewish customs and values, and celebrations of holidays.

"There was no prayer. I did not ask anyone to put on tfillin. I knew what my boundaries were and never crossed them," he said.

"Everybody was always welcome, boys and girls. There were Christians and Muslims – sometimes half the group was not Jewish."

Gehr describes the ban as "one more indication of the direction in which our province is going in terms of reasonable accommodation," she wrote.

"My school has 150 to 200 Jewish students and yet we are not allowed to do anything to serve this population."

She declined to make any further comment on the record.

Cohen said Bill 180 not only rules out religious instruction, it also prohibits "any religious figure" from coming into a school, even for an extracurricular activity. "It would be the same if it was a Catholic priest," he said.

Cohen's press release last spring described how about 15 students met every Wednesday at Royal West, where 15 per cent of the students are Jewish. On the day described, they were learning about Purim.

The club at Royal West received a grant last year from Federation CJA's Gen J program, which supports innovative programming to connect young Jews to their heritage.

The money, which Rabbi Pearlstein said primarily covered the cost of the kosher pizza, was issued to the school, which in turn gave him a cheque as reimbursement.

Rabbi Pearlstein said the clubs' existence was well publicized in the schools, pointing out that notices of the weekly club meetings were sometimes on the bulletin board or on the school website.

"Every couple of weeks, the spiritual animator [a school staff position] sat in on the club just to see that everything was OK," he said. "I was not sneaking into the school."

Rabbi Pearlstein added that another rabbi from the Chai Centre, which runs a youth drop-in program, continues to lead similar clubs at schools under the Lester B. Pearson School Board, the other English board in Montreal. Rabbi Pearlstein said he started the clubs at the request of some Jewish students. A typical club meeting saw Rabbi Pearlstein present an ethical dilemma to the students and encourage them to offer their views, he said. Topics often centred on the value of human life – suicide, abortion, euthanasia, or whether one should risk his life to save another's.

"Basically, I wanted to hear the kids' opinions… It was all about education. I didn't try to convert anybody… I'm not sure what to think. I'm still trying to figure out what happened. I'm confused," he said.

Cohen, who is also a Côte St. Luc city councillor, is suggesting an alternative that would allow the Royal West club to continue.

He approached Montreal West Mayor Beny Masella, who has agreed to allow the club to meet at lunchtime at city hall, "a two-minute walk away."

"I am sticking my head out to facilitate this," Cohen said. "Something similar at off-campus sites could be arranged for other schools."

However, if the club did meet there, it would not be under Royal West's or the EMSB's auspices, he said.

Cohen noted that he has personally tried over the last 15 years to bring Jewish content of a cultural or intercultural nature into the EMSB, including Holocaust education and exchanges with Jewish schools.

Cohen also noted that Royal Vale and several elementary EMSB schools have for many years offered Jewish heritage language programs, sanctioned by the education ministry and known by the acronym PELO, which teach Hebrew, as well as Jewish history and culture.

He suggests that Royal West students could press for its introduction at their school, or they might ask the school's spiritual animator to help them organize some kind of programming with a Jewish theme.

While Royal Vale is the only high school running PELO now, there are plans for a Jewish heritage program to be offered at Wallenberg Academy, a high school in Côte St. Luc that the EMSB hopes to open in 2014, Cohen said.

He was so excited that he jumped up and down… [and said] 'This must be what looking down from Heaven is like!'"

"This memory inspired me to rebuild the tower," Hertzman said. "I hope his spirit can provide some light for the temple to shine again."

Tom Friedland, chair of the Holy Blossom Temple Renewal Project steering committee said he was grateful to the Hertzmans for sharing such a personal event with the congregation.

"It was very rewarding to see what was the formal kick-off of the renewal project," for which more than $18 million has already been raised, he said.

Plans to renovate and restore the Reform congregation's 75-year-old building date back to 2004, when the shul's board approved a plan to turn the sanctuary around 180 degrees to face Jerusalem.

The original design, conceived in the 1930s, intentionally had the sanctuary face west, away from Jerusalem.

The issue deeply divided the 7,000-member congregation, and in 2007, 42 per cent of the congregation voted against the reorientation.

"There was a sense that the people who felt passionately about not reorienting it, felt passionately about it and we were not going to have shalom bayit without rethinking that," Friedland said.

"Shortly after that vote, the board went back to the architects and thought we should just leave it in the direction that it is. That is the tradition of this temple, and it is absolutely the right decision."

But the controversy didn't end there. A 2012 Globe and Mail article suggested that when Rabbi John Moscowitz, the spiritual leader who served Holy Blossom for 25 years, endorsed the proposal to shift the main sanctuary's orientation, it ultimately led to his ouster.

The treatment of Rabbi Moscowitz – who is currently on a three-year sabbatical until 2015, when he will retire and continue as rabbi emeritus – also caused a rift, because his supporters felt that "a cadre of old guard board members had been plotting to remove him for years" due to his right-wing Zionist leanings, the Globe report said.

But Friedland said the congregation is looking ahead to provide for the next generation of Holy Blossom members.

"We're moving forward with the physical renewal, and the rabbinic transition committee is also trying to confirm who our senior rabbi will be," he said.

"The hope is to have a person in place for the next high holidays… and they are moving forward with the interview process."

As for the renovations, the latest version of the plans – adopted last year when Leo Baeck Day School's south campus moved to a new location – boasts a new central atrium gathering space, a new family chapel, enhanced outdoor areas, a renovated congregational hall, a modernized education wing, a restored main sanctuary and updated, environmentally friendly HVAC and electrical systems.

"There is a palpable sense that we're really moving forward, and people come up to you, and say, 'We're so excited, we've been waiting a long time for this,'" and it is important to show ourselves that we are capable of doing it."

More than 400 people gathered at the Ontario Science Centre for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's annual Major Gifts Gala Sept. 15, hard on the heels of Yom Kippur.

"We have raised to date $33 million dollars, but our work is just beginning," Stephen Diamond, UJA annual campaign co-chair said. "I have heard that if you are Jewish and you live in Toronto, it's likely that your children and your grandchildren will live here as well, so I don't think we can overemphasize the importance of the UJA organization, which has been with us for close to 100 years. It is the basis for our continued unity as a community today, and for future generations."

His campaign co-chair Lisa Draper shared stories about people who have been helped by some of UJA's more than100 partner agencies.

Ben, a recovering addict, she said, "was from a privileged home. He attended summer camp. He participated in Birthright, but he took a dramatic turn in the wrong direction. Today, Ben is three years clean because of the lifesaving work of the Jewish Addiction Counselling Services, and he speaks to our community about his journey and how UJA saved his life."

"Through your gift, each of you here tonight is funding… incentives that… can make a real, transformative difference," she said.

Daniel, whose story she also told, moved with his family from El Salvador because of the political uncertainty back home.

"It was a difficult transition for his family," she said. But through the work of the Jewish Vocational Service and the Women's Philanthropy Project, "Daniel and his wife were able to settle into our community and build a family and gain employment. Today, Daniel is paying it forward by volunteering at our UJA telethons."

"These stories are all part of the mosaic that shapes our community," UJA Women's Philanthropy chair Lori Rosenthal said. "Connecting to the people we help makes our fundraising experience more personal, more meaningful."

Seinfeld veteran Jason Alexander, who has been dubbed by Entertainment Weekly as one of the "best television sidekicks of all time," entertained the audience with his comedy and personal experiences.

"Gut yontif, everyone," Alexander greeted the crowd. He then talked about his love of magic, acting and family.

When Seinfeld ended, Alexander said, he wanted to return to New York to perform in the theatre. Unfortunately, theatre life meant late nights.

"My wife said, 'Do you believe you will remember your great nights on stage, or the nights you tucked your boys into bed?' I stayed at home with my boys, and am so happy I did."

Racquets Not Rockets Campaign Update

Thank you to each and every one of you, who helped make possible through your donations, the purchase and installation of 26 portable bomb shelters and 7 large shelters so far - at our 14 tennis centers throughout Israel.

Still required: 19 more portable bomb shelters - at a cost of $25,000 per unit. Please help us shelter the children with love from Canada - by making a donation towards the purchase of these bomb shelters. All donations received in aid of this critical project are welcome, appreciated, and fully tax receiptable.

Message from the Israel Tennis Centers CEO regarding the situation in the Western Galilee:

Thursday, August 22, 2013

"Yesterday at about 4:00 pm, the newly installed portable bomb shelters at the Israel Tennis Center in Akko were used for the first time, as 4 rockets were fired at the western Galilee. As soon as the alarm sounded the children moved swiftly into the shelters with the staff. Having these shelters made a huge difference in the safety and feeling of the children and staff.

Thank you to all our friends in the USA and Canada for SHELTERING OUR CHILDREN WITH LOVE. May we never have to use the shelters again. With much gratitude and appreciation,"

Danny Gelley, CEO
Israel Tennis Centers, Ramat Hasharon, Israel

Shaping lifelong champions since 1976

For 37 years the Israel Tennis Centers have been promoting the social, psychological and physical development of Israeli youth through the medium of sport.

Using the game of tennis as a framework, just over 20,000 children participated last year in Israel Tennis Centers programs from Kiryat Shmona in the north to Beer Sheva in the south. Many of the 14 Israel Tennis Centers are located in economically challenged neighborhoods and outlying development towns.

Programs for Developmentally and Physically Challenged, Arab/Jewish Coexistence Doubles, Coexistence Kindergartens, and Ethiopian community programming are among the many ITC programs - all focused on tolerance, belief in one's self and the virtues of teamwork.

That the Israel Tennis Centers turn out world class Israeli tennis champions is a fortunate and exciting by-product. Every kid can be a champion in life.

Chemical weapons make a difference

Money Matters
Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

Jewish law doesn't recognize the concept of a separate small claims court. All claims in Jewish law are to be treated equally, and a court must hear cases in the order they arrive before it. A $10 case may not be pushed aside in order to hear a class-action multi-million dollar claim.

Theft is theft, and the amounts involved are, philosophically, almost secondary. It's the violation of another and a denial of God's role in "assigning" wealth to whom He see fit. Just as one cannot be a "little pregnant," one cannot be a "little dishonest."

I was thinking of this as U.S. President Barack Obama made his case for intervention in Syria. As long as 100,000 plus people were killed using "conventional means," there was little call for action, but gas 1,000 people to death and there's great outrage. Does it really matter how evildoers perpetrate their wrongdoings?

Not surprisingly, the issue is complex and nuanced. While it was rarely carried out in practice, capital punishment was meted out in one of four possible ways, reflecting the varying levels of the crime involved. In explaining the need for the courts to ensure as painless a death as possible, the Talmud invokes as its source the verse "you shall love your neighbour as yourself." Apparently the method of death is something to consider seriously.

And so is the method of theft. Jewish law distinguishes between a ganav and a gazlan. The former acts surreptitiously, engaging in say, white-collar fraud, expecting that no one will notice. A gazlan however is more brazen and open about his dishonesty, and would not hesitate to mug you on the street or walk into a bank demanding cash.

While I imagine most people would prefer that someone defraud them than put a gun in their back, the ganav receives a greater punishment than a gazlan. While an armed robber must pay back the amount stolen, a fraudster must pay back double the amount, something our criminal justice system might want to copy.

While the amount stolen might be the same, methodology makes a huge difference. Our sages teach that a ganav is afraid of man but not God, a sad inversion of priorities. At least a gazlan isn't hypocritical, as he fears neither God nor man.

"Fighting fair" while terrible is still better than stabbing someone in back. Chemical weapons do make a difference.

While some might find any analogy between killing and monetary wrongdoing jarring, there's much that unites them. Many have been murdered over financial disputes and many wars have been fought over economic issues. One can rest assured that had, for example, there been a threat to world oil supplies, western intervention would have happened long ago. And such economic considerations are no less a legitimate reason for war than most others.

The link between money and life wasn't invented by Shakespeare. In biblical Hebrew, the word damim means both blood and money. And the laws of self-defence, including killing the potential perpetrator, are recorded in regard to someone who breaks into your home.

Respect for life begins with respect for property.

Repentance, mysticism & kreplach

Jewish & Digital
Mark Mietklewicz

The evening begins with a festive meal that includes a steaming bowl of soup with a couple of kreplach. The next morning, the final day of Sukkot, seven circuits are made around the synagogue. And then, with some willow branches in hand, we give the floor a good thwacking. Although Hoshanah Rabah may sometimes be overlooked in a season full of festivals, this spiritual day plays a unique role reminiscent of Yom Kippur.

According to Chabad.org: "The custom of beating the willows on the ground has great mystical meaning known only to the very wise who merit the knowledge of these secrets." [http://bit.ly/hoshrab1] Rabbi Yisroel Miller says that causing the leaves to fall away symbolizes "the falling away of the sparks of Divine Judgment; and we cast it away as an end to the Days of Judgment." For an explanation, see the rabbi's essay Beating the Branches. [http://bit.ly/hoshrab2]

As for what to say while circling your shul, download a booklet from the Rabbinical Assembly with Hebrew, English translation and annotation from the Talmud, Midrash and Zohar. [http://bit.ly/hoshrab3] And to find out HOW to do it (Do you do the circuit clockwise or counterclockwise? Can you reuse the willow branches?), check out the FAQ from Aish.com. [http://bit.ly/hoshrab4]

Hoshanah Rabah does not share the same work prohibitions as other Jewish festivals. That's why you can watch a video of the late Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach as he conducted a holiday service at New York City's Congregation Kehilath Jacob. [http://bit.ly/hoshrab5] Or check out excerpts from an early morning service at the Kotel. [http://bit.ly/hoshrab6] You can get a very different feel for the day by listening to a Yemenite congregation reciting the central, hypnotic refrain of the day, "Hoshanah. Ana HaShem Hoshiah Na!" – "Please save. Please, God, save now!" [http://bit.ly/hoshrab7]

On Hoshanah Rabah, the chazan dons a white kittel and chants prayers using quotes from a midrash in which God says to Abraham, "I will give your descendants a special day for forgiveness: Hoshanah Rabah. If they are not forgiven on Rosh Hashanah, then let them try Yom Kippur; if not, then Hoshanah Rabah." [http://bit.ly/hoshrab9]

Yom Kippur and Hoshanah Rabah share something else – kreplach, triangular pockets of dough with meat or other stuffing. Robin Treistman explains, "These holidays are connected to each other because they involve some sort of striking or beating: On Yom Kippur, we beat our heart in prayer, on Hoshanah Rabah we beat willow branches." [http://bit.ly/hoshrab10] The Nishmas site suggests that judgment (symbolized by meat) is clothed in kindness (symbolized by the dough). [http://bit.ly/hoshrab12]

Now that you know the reason, you can take your pick of kreplach recipes from the Jewish Food Archives including beef, bite-sized, chicken liver, kasha and cheese. [http://bit.ly/hoshrab13] If you still haven't had your fill, the RFCJ Recipe Archive includes kreplach with spinach and with shiitake mushrooms. [http://bit.ly/hoshrab14]

As Hoshanah Rabah draws to a close – and before things get a bit wild on Shmini Atzeret and Simchat Torah – we wish family and friends special greetings that hearken back to Rosh Hashanah: have a gutten kvittel (Yiddish) or Pitka Tava (Aramaic). Literally, may you merit "a good note" of God's judgment. [http://bit.ly/hoshrab15]

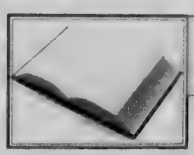
Wear your Judaism

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler



Rabbinic Reflections

Quebec's government recently released its proposed "Charter of Quebec Values." According to reports, this law would ban public employees from wearing kippot, turbans and other religious symbols. Most political commentators have explained that the PQ party is seeking to win the next election through divisive identity politics. This is deplorable.

As Jews, we must ask what this means to us as members of Canadian society. What is today absurd tomorrow may be taken for granted. Many of us are aware of the norms is Spain and Sweden, where without laws requiring they do so, Jews refrain from publicly identifying themselves. They wear hats or remove their kippot when in public.

A charter of values like this has two effects. It rallies those who have fear for those who are different, and it besets those who are different with a fear of being different. Even if this charter is never enacted – the proposal itself affects us as a minority. Sikh, Muslims, and Jews are less likely to identify themselves because of this hateful approach to minority culture.

I would like to propose a counter-offensive. If we are to defend ourselves, we must find ways (even outside Quebec) to proclaim that we are proud of what makes us different. We should champion the kippah and other forms of distinct Jewish dress – for both Jewish men and women.

Yet, in order to do so, we must understand why it is that the kippah is worn. Now, it may come as a surprise to many, but a kippah is never mentioned in the Torah, and it is not described as an obligation in the Talmud. Why then do we wear it?

The Talmud (Shabbat 156b) relates a story: A woman was told by astrologers that her son would become a thief. To prevent this from happening, she insisted that he always cover his head, to remind him of God's presence and instil within him the fear of heaven. Once, while sitting under a neighbour's palm tree, his head covering fell off. He was suddenly overcome by an urge to eat a date from the tree. It was then that he realized the effect that wearing a kippah had on him.

We wear the kippah to be aware of God. We do so not as an obligation – rather, we do so to achieve a special cognition. We take a mundane non-holy material and imbue it with meaning. A simple textile upon our heads becomes a reminder of God's presence in our lives.

The claim that the crucifix that hangs in Quebec's national assembly is a mere cultural symbol cynically takes what Christians have taken for generations as holy and makes it mundane. By contrast, our tradition takes that which is mundane and makes it a means of divine awareness and holiness.

As we conclude the yom tov season, let us find ways to imbue our lives with holiness. Let us recognize that God does not reside in our synagogues alone. God is everywhere that we let Him in – everywhere that we acknowledge His presence.

Wear your Judaism, and wear it with pride.

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler is spiritual leader of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation in Toronto.

What's missing from PJ Library

From the Bimah
Rabbi Catharine Clark

For congregational rabbis, every Shabbat is "Take Our Daughters and Sons to Work Day." Considering that my daughter, Naomi, is two years old and cannot object (yet!) to going to shul, my "mom-self" and my "rabbi-self" are usually in complete agreement.

But rumblings of dissent make themselves heard when I read the books in Naomi's PJ Library to her. PJ Library is a project of the Harold Greenspoon Foundation, in partnership with local Jewish communities. As a subscriber, Naomi receives a free book each month.

As a mom, I love PJ Library. I love it because Naomi loves the books. Many selections, such as Nosh Schlep Schluff: BabYiddish by Laurel Snyder and When It's Purim by Edie Stoltz Zolkower, feature excellent rhythm and rhyme, two adorable qualities in children's books.

Bright and engaging illustrations add to the appeal of other books, most particularly Thank You, Trees by Gail Langer Karwoski and Marilyn E. Gootman, and I am always amused by the interest Naomi shows in Where is Baby's Dreidel, a "lift-the-flap" book by Karen Katz.

I love PJ library also because it makes parenting easier. A few of the books, such as Good Night Israel by Mark Jasper and Anne Rosen and Goodnight Sh'ma by Jacqueline Jules, are about going to sleep, a beloved theme in children's books for reasons obvious to any parent of a toddler. A new book arrives each month, too, never mind that I have not had time to order anything off Amazon, let alone go to Chapters to select a book to add to our evening repertoire.

As a rabbi, however, my feelings about PJ Library are mixed. Judaism is the structure and content of my life, not an exercise in nostalgia. The books in Naomi's PJ Library lean more toward the latter. Sunrise, Sunset with lyrics by Sheldon Harnick and music by Jerry Bock, is the worst offender in this category. The words are lifted straight from Fiddler on the Roof. In the illustrations, by Ian Schoenherr, Tzeitel and Motel grow into courtship, chupah, and new parenthood under Tevye's watchful but benevolent eye.

Sunrise, Sunset would be a perfect PJ Library selection for families in an idealized 19th-century shtetl, but Naomi and her fellow two-year-olds will need to create their vibrant Jewish lives in 21st-century cities and suburbs.

Another problem is that the books can be pareve. Judaism at its best poses a challenge to secular culture, an opportunity missed by Thank You For Me!, by Rick Recht. The book promotes the worthy value of expressing gratitude, but the blessings for which the little-boy protagonist is grateful are exemplified by his words, "Thank you for the faith I have in myself." A belief in the value, even sovereignty, of self is already well-promoted in secular culture. A truer Jewish value to encourage would be humility before God or the importance of community.

PJ Library's website states, "Foremost early-childhood educators and children's literature experts choose our age-appropriate book and music list." The word "Jewish" should appear in this statement. Incorporating input as well from individuals with depth and texture to their Jewish lives would put my "mom-self" and my "rabbi-self" back in complete agreement.

Was I being tested on Yom Kippur?

Susan Rumack
Special to The CJN

Was Eliyahu, the prophet Elijah, wandering the Streets of Toronto Erev Yom Kippur? Did I show up as less than righteous?

Surrounded by family, I sit in the front pew as the cantor leads the congregation in the holiest of prayers on the most spiritually reflective night of this Jewish year 5774. Little do I know then that by the end of this inwardly reflective Erev Yom Kippur Shabbat evening, I will be challenged to take an even harder look at how I "walk my talk"!

During Kol Nidrei and throughout the evening, I ask myself, "How did I show up for my fellow man in the past year? What will I do better in the upcoming year? Will I be tested? How and how soon?"

Services end, two of my oldest friends and I are the last to leave, locking the synagogue doors behind us. The power of the past few hours lingers. As we bid the security guard good night, a youngish man with a backpack approaches from the dark street asking if one of my companions is the rabbi. No, is the answer. Then the young man tells us that he is Jewish and homeless, with nowhere to sleep. My companion apologizes, saying he cannot give him a bed and suggests he return in the morning to speak to the rabbi. My whole body freezes, as I remind him that the young man has nowhere to sleep tonight! Again the young man is shooed away with, "Come back tomorrow." He graciously wishes us Shanah Tovah and moves off down the street.

Guest Voice

Susan Rumack

My world is spinning. Had I just allowed a Jewish man with nowhere to sleep on Erev Yom Kippur to disappear into the chilly night? What about all the legends of ordinary women and men opening their hearts to others in need, especially on holy days? What of Eliyahu and his endless quest for the righteous among us? Closer to home, what about all the food bank donations in the basement of the shul and reminders of the Out of the Cold programs? And what of the request from the bimah, only moments earlier, for tzedakah?

Yes, I know all the "right" thoughts… he could be a scammer or a con man, a murderer, a thief or a psycho. Or couldn't he just as easily be a Jewish man in need of help?

I did nothing! I could have asked for the story that brought him to this tiny shul on this night of all nights, but I didn't. I could have offered to get him to a hostel, and pay for lodgings for a night or two, but I didn't. I could have called Toronto's Referral Centre for the locations of available free beds, but didn't. I could have asked if he was hungry and taken him to a nearby restaurant for a good meal but I didn't. Instead, as part of a group, I turned him away on the only night of the year that we ourselves beg our Creator to write us into the Book of Life for one more year and to forgive our human failings.

If this was a test, I failed. We were a group of three. We each had our individual reasons. Perhaps we have been scammed before. It was late. We were tired. It was dark and this was a stranger.

The questions I ask myself are: "How long would it have taken to ask a few questions or make a few phone calls? How deep was our individual intrinsic distrust of the story we didn't even ask to hear?"

If this wasn't a test, we callously allowed one of our own to be alone, cold and abandoned when he asked us to step up.

If this was a test, Eliyahu was denied and is still wandering the earth, specifically the streets of Toronto, looking for righteous men and women.

What have I personally learned after a sleepless night? I allowed an old pattern of behaviour to override my natural inclination to respond to a call for help. In recent years, this old behaviour of allowing others to make my decisions has been sidelined, but obviously not eradicated. This is the last time I will ever allow another person to override my sense of right or wrong. In the future, regardless of who I am with, I will speak up and do what, in my heart, I know to be the right thing for me. At the very least, I could have asked for his story and then chosen my actions, but I didn't even ask. Is the lesson that we should ask? Is the lesson that I must strive to maintain my neshamah (soul)?

Two Canadians killed in terrorist attack

"This time, the story is not about Israel," she told the New York Times.

The spokesperson told the Times that the ArtCaffe, which is located on the ground floor, is popular with foreigners.

Two Canadians died in the attack, while four Americans were injured, according to the U.S. State Department.

On Monday, Canadian officials were investigating reports a 24-year-old Ontario man was among the attackers.

Al Shabab said the attack was revenge for Kenya's military operations in Somalia that began nearly two years ago, according to the Times.

Yariv Kedar – who has been living in Nairobi for the past seven years and is the vice-chairman of Amiran Kenya Ltd., an Israeli agriculture company based in Nairobi – was inside the Westgate mall when the attack began and told Israel Hayom, "All of a sudden I heard the sounds of large explosions and shooting from every direction. A group of motorcyclists were at the entrance to the mall and started shooting wildly toward the entrance."

Kedar, 53, was holding a business meeting with a Kenyan local at one of the mall's cafés. Westgate mall has four Israeli-owned restaurants, each employing Israelis.

Kedar told Ynet news that he and his Israeli co-worker hid his passport and work papers identifying him as Israeli while trying to avoid kidnap or worse.

"The entire time I was thinking of how to get myself out of that hell," Kedar said.

"I understood it was a terrorist attack and not a robbery, and I decided to hide my Israeli identity – documents, driver's licence, passport, ID, etc. I managed to call several senior Israeli representatives with my cellphone and tell them what was happening."

Islamist terrorists attacked an Israeli-owned hotel in Kenya in 2002, and three Israelis were among the 13 casualties. Four years earlier, an Al Qaeda attack killed more than 200 people and destroyed the Nairobi-based American embassy.

Hebron house resettlement ordered after killing

The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — In the wake of the killing of an IDF soldier by a Palestinian sniper in Hebron Sunday night, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu ordered the immediate resettlement of Beit Hamachpela, a building near the West Bank city's Tomb of Patriarchs which was previously boarded up by order of the Defense Ministry.

Sgt. Gal Gabriel Kobi, 20, from Tirat HaCarmel was shot in the neck at an IDF checkpoint near the Tomb of the Patriarchs and succumbed to his wounds in Jerusalem's Shaare Zedek Medical Center.

"Those who try to uproot us from Hebron, the city of our forefathers, will only achieve the opposite," said Netanyahu in a statement. "We will continue to fight terrorism with one hand, and strengthen settlements with the other."

An Israeli source in Hebron had said earlier in the evening that the city's Jewish community was pressuring politicians to approve the resettlement of Beit Hamachpela. The building made headlines in late March 2012 after settlers made a clandestine move into the building.

At the time settlers produced paperwork showing that the building was purchased from local Palestinians, but the Civil Administration and the Defense Ministry demanded the eviction of the occupants. In July, a military appeals committee ruled that the disputed building was indeed legally purchased and there was no reason to prevent the Israelis from living in it.

Sunday's incident, the second killing of an IDF soldier by Palestinians in the past several days, came amid U.S.-led peace efforts, which resumed in July after a nearly three-year break in negotiations. On Sept. 20, Sgt. Tomer Hazan, 20, was lured to a village near Qalqilya in the West Bank by 42-year-old Nidal Amar, who admitted to the Israel Security Agency that he kidnapped and killed him in the hope of trading the corpse for his brother's release from Israeli prison.

Washington condemned the killing of the soldiers and called on all parties to denounce the slayings.

"Such violence and terror are unacceptable, and undermine efforts to establish the positive atmosphere the parties need to progress in peace negotiations," State Department spokeswoman Jen Psaki said in an emailed statement.

As part of the renewed talks, Israel agreed to release more than 100 long-term Palestinian terror convicts from its jails, in four phases. A first phase of the releases went ahead last month, and another is due shortly.

The West Bank settlers' Yesha Council called on the government to cease talks with the Palestinian Authority immediately, and stop releasing the Palestinian terrorists.

Environmental Minister Amir Peretz (Hatnua) argued, however, that negotiations are the best response to extremists from either side, and said that what he called the attempt by right-wing radicals to take advantage of the pain of Kobi's family ought to be condemned.

European Union foreign policy chief Catherine Ashton responded to Kobi's death Sunday, saying, "The EU regrets the loss of life, urges for maximum restraint and reiterates its call to all parties to refrain from actions that could undermine the negotiation process and the prospects of peace."

Despite calls by the U.S. to denounce the incidents, the Palestinian Authority's foreign minister said Monday that the slaying of two Israeli soldiers by Palestinians in separate incidents in as many days should not influence peace negotiations. The statement marked the only official comment from Palestinian officials on the issue, which noticeably refrained from condemning the killings.

"This is no reason to shake off the requirements of the peace [process] in any way," Riyad al-Malki told the Ma'an news agency on Monday.

Palestinian father denounces son

Avi Issacharoff
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — The father of a Palestinian man who confessed to kidnapping and killing an unarmed IDF soldier in the West Bank over the weekend expressed shock and disgust over his son's actions Sunday, saying he would kill his offspring if he could.

"I am telling you this from the bottom of my heart... if the military would today give me an M-16 (assault rifle), I would go and shoot my son in the head," Abdullah Amar told The Times of Israel.

Tomer Hazan's murder took place in the Palestinian village of Beit Amin, where Nidal Amar's family lives.

On Sept. 21, Nidal Amar, 42, was apprehended by Israeli security forces, who were searching for Hazan. Nidal Amar admitted to Israel Security Agency agents that he lured Hazan, a Bat Yam native, to the village on Sept. 20 before killing him as part of a plan to use his body as a bargaining chip for his brother's release from an Israeli jail.

The Amar family compound is only about 40 metres away from the West Bank security barrier and the outermost houses of the Sha'arei Tikva settlement. Hazan, 20, was killed in a field nearby. His body was thrown into a well.

Nidal Amar's father, shaken and distraught, made it clear that he did not support his son's actions.

"I and all my family, from the youngest to the eldest, condemn the murder of a man who came here without a weapon," he said Sunday. "I could never imagine that Nidal would cause harm to anyone."

Festival aims to put Jewish art on the map

Ben Sales
JTA

JERUSALEM — The reader opened with a recitation of Psalm 48 followed by a contemporary poem before yielding the floor to five male dancers, all wearing the standard haredi Orthodox uniform of black pants and white button-down shirt. One had bushy earlocks, but no yarmulke.

So began the inaugural Jerusalem Biennale, a six-week contemporary art festival that launched this week and will run through the end of October.

Seeking to combine the best in Jewish and contemporary art, all of the pieces on display — from oversize worry beads bearing words like "Iran" and "militant Islam" to an installation of a Shabbat dinner table — share a single goal: To show that Jewish art reaches far beyond the kiddush cups and menorahs available in synagogue gift shops.

> 'Not your grandmother's challah covers'

"We wanted an event that maps out what exists today in common between the contemporary art world and the Jewish world," said Ram Ozeri, the event's organizer. "I am interested in where the world of Jewish content comes out through art. Because it's a dominant ingredient in Israeli identity, it doesn't make sense that it will have no expression."

Exhibiting in five Jerusalem locations and including works by more than 50 artists, the festival aims to serve as a proving ground for emerging Jewish artists and as an opportunity for more established but still unknown artists to reach a wide audience.

Ozeri is hoping the debut biennale is the first step in a recurring and larger undertaking.

Ken Goldman, a Memphis-born multimedia artist who lives on Kibbutz Shluchot in northern Israel, called the festival "not your grandmother's challah covers."

"It's a chance to get in on the ground," said Goldman, 53. "We're a very small community of modern artists dealing with Jewish subjects. It's a chance to meet the world, show our stuff. I want to have one foot here and one foot there, and be straddling that edge."

Like many of the works in the festival, Goldman's piece – a photograph of his arm with the deep imprint of tfillin straps along with the biblical quote "You shall bind them as a sign" – deals explicitly with religious ritual.

Many of the works in another exhibit, at the Heichal Shlomo synagogue, explore the meanings of key phrases in the Torah or abstract concepts like divine holiness.

"It was fun imagining in my head what the rabbis would look like," said Jessica Deutsch, 22, the youngest artist featured at the festival.

Deutsch is exhibiting a series of nine drawings depicting the first two chapters of the Jewish ethical tract Pirkei Avot.

"In my heart I just consider myself Jewish," she said. "Projects in my sketchbook will reflect what I'm learning."

The biennale's best claim to prestige in the contemporary art world comes from Tobi Kahn, a well-regarded New York-based artist who has been featured in a range of museums over a three-decade career. For the festival, he contributed "Urah VI," a Rothko-esque painting with solid-colour squares meant to evoke the gemstone breastplate of the ancient Israelite high priest.

Another exhibit features Kahn's "Saphyr," a wooden table with a compartmentalized tray holding 49 small sculptures — an innovative way to count the Omer, the 49-day period between Passover and Shavuot.

"The most interesting thing for me in Judaism is time," Kahn said. "I'm intrigued by what time means, the whole Jewish law of when Shabbat starts. I'm thrilled to be part of an exhibit that's opening its doors to many types of Jewish understanding."

While the exhibits feature a range of media and deal with a wide spectrum of Jewish topics, Ronit Steinberg, a professor of modern Jewish art at Bezalel Academy of Arts and Design in Jerusalem, said the festival risks drawing an exclusively Jewish audience.

"It needs to be marketed so that it isn't provincial and closed," Steinberg said. "We know that there's a danger when you define an exhibit under a certain religion. We need to persuade people to come see this just as art."

While he understands that the festival will not soon attain the reputation of famous biennales like those in Venice and Berlin, Ozeri hopes over time it will at least become synonymous with the cutting edge of Jewish art.

"Jerusalem is trying to compete with New York and Berlin and Liverpool in Western art, and it can't really put up a fight," Ozeri said. "Jerusalem can become an art centre if it uses its comparative advantage."

Pillar of strength for the Toronto Blue Jays

Stephen Sweet
Special to The CJN

Just over two years ago, Kevin Pillar was a college senior, playing Division II baseball in California. Today, he's the centre fielder for the Toronto Blue Jays.

The Jewish outfielder, who was called up from Toronto's AAA affiliate in Buffalo on Aug. 14, has loved the Major League Baseball experience so far.

"It's everything I thought it would be and more," said Pillar, who grew up in West Hills, Calif., the son of a Jewish mother and Christian father. "You have this thought as to what it would be like, but it doesn't compare once you get here.

"You're playing in big league stadiums in front of 40,000 people in first-class accommodations. It's been everything I thought, plus a lot more."

Pillar was inserted into the lineup immediately upon arrival, but struggled at the plate, going hitless in his first five games.

"I wouldn't say it concerned [me], but it was definitely something I was thinking about, because it was something where I worked so hard to get to this position since I was a little kid," said Pillar, who stands six-feet tall and weighs 200 pounds.

"Just to get that first hit, it's something every player coming up wants to get out of the way so they can get back to playing."

In the second game of an Aug. 20 day-night double-header against the New York Yankees, and with his family in the stands, Pillar led off the third inning with a single up the middle off starter Phil Hughes.

"It took a little longer than I would have hoped, but getting it at Yankee Stadium and getting it with my parents there was pretty special," he said.

Pillar's parents came up from California, where the outfielder had been a three-sport star in high school.

Though Pillar said his household growing up was "never super religious either way," he did have a bar mitzvah.

"Growing up, we just celebrated pretty much all of the holidays," Pillar said. "Both of my parents aren't very religious, but my grandparents are, so we did it more out of respect for them."

As a youngster, Pillar became a big fan of Toronto's last Jewish outfielder.

"Shawn Green was one of my favourites when he played in Los Angeles," he said. "He was one of the guys I looked up to, not because he was Jewish, just because he was a good person, a good player, and he happened to play for the Dodgers."

Pillar went to nearby Cal State-Dominguez Hills to play NCAA baseball, where he made national headlines by setting a Division II record with a 54-game hitting streak.

Despite the streak, Pillar wasn't drafted by the Blue Jays until the 32nd round in 2011.

Toronto sent him to their rookie league affiliate in Bluefield, W.Va., where he played alongside Jewish ballplayer Ian Kadish.

"He's actually one of my good friends now," Pillar said of the right-handed pitcher.

Since that first pro season, Pillar has begun a quick ascension to the major leagues.

In 2012, he hit .322, finishing the year with the high-A Dunedin Blue Jays.

He began this season with the AA New Hampshire Fisher Cats, but was promoted to AAA in June after some strong play.

When Blue Jays centre-fielder Colby Rasmus was placed on the disabled list, Pillar was the one to get the call.

"I figured I would maybe get a chance to come up in September after my season in Buffalo," Pillar said.

"But being here and playing what I felt was pretty solid, I figured I wouldn't be [sent down to the minors] with [outfielder Jose] Bautista and Rasmus still out."

That will give Pillar the rest of the season to try and prove he's ready to be a major leaguer. In 68 at-bats in 25 games, he was hitting a modest .176.

Pillar is already looking towards next season. "I really want to show the organization, teammates and coaches that I belong here, and hopefully, I can make the opening day roster and be a part of this team," he said.

Russian community partners in entrepreneur program

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

If you catch an episode of Dragon's Den, you'll see would-be entrepreneurs pitch an idea for a can't-miss product to a group of skeptical business investors.

It makes for good TV, but there are plenty of intermediate steps that have to be taken before most entrepreneurs are ready to succeed in business. Enter the York Entrepreneurship Development Institute (YEDInstitute), which recently kicked off its own version of Dragon's Den, in co-operation with several partners, but with an educational and mentoring component thrown in.

Marat Ressin

The new program is designed to provide would-be entrepreneurs with the business acumen necessary to make their ideas financially viable. It goes beyond the financing stage to include an educational one, designed to give the ideas-people the real-world skills necessary to make their concepts work. At the end of the day, there's still the opportunity to pitch the product to a panel of investors with money burning a hole in their pockets.

The YEDInstitute kicked off its first session recently at the Schulich Executive Education Centre at York University. On hand to mark the occasion were Marat Ressin, founder of the YEDInstitute, Anindya Mittra, senior manager of the Business Development Bank of Canada (BDC), Rabbi Mendel Zaltzman, head of program development at the Jewish Russian Community Centre of Ontario (JRCC), as well as MPs and local dignitaries.

The YEDInstitute is a collaboration of the Schulich Executive Education Centre, the JRCC, 3V Communications and the BDC.

"YEDInstitute hopes to graduate ventures, including non-profits, that will have a positive social impact for the Toronto and York Region communities, as well as the Canadian economy at large," said Dana Ayrapetyan, YEDInstitute's project director.

The program is conceived as a way to help budding entrepreneurs acquire the skills they need to make a success of their ideas, said Rabbi Zaltzman. Candidates go through an extensive interview process to determine whether they have the right stuff to warrant the kind of investment in them that is contemplated by the YEDInstitute. Candidates must not only have an innovative idea for a product, but they're also screened to determine if they possess the human capital to succeed in business, he said.

Once accepted into the program, participants undergo a three-month business education program delivered at the Schulich Executive Education Centre. The evening program will be accompanied by a mentorship program, and in the end, they'll pitch their product to potential investment angels.

Fifteen entrepreneurs – from the commercial and non-profit sectors – have been selected for the inaugural session, with about half coming from the Russian Jewish community. The JRCC advertised the program heavily and many candidates came forward, Rabbi Zaltzman said.

Ressin, the Russian-born founder of the YEDInstitute, said he approached the JRCC and "asked Rabbi Zaltzman to support this because it's a good way to make the world better."

A member and supporter of the JRCC, Ressin said that while living in Russia he had volunteered with PresenTense, a largely volunteer-run organization that attempts to foster social entrepreneurs with the goal of revitalizing Jewish communities. It operates in Russia, Israel and the United States.

With his expertise in turning around floundering small businesses, Ressin thought the YEDInstitute could combine the best of both worlds – fostering social responsibility in commercial entrepreneurs while educating social entrepreneurs in how to operate on a sound financial basis.

"The goal of the project is to create a new model for the startup accelerator," said Ayrapetyan.

The Toronto program will see business entrepreneurs rubbing shoulders with equally talented people whose ideas are geared to charitable non-profits. The influences should flow both ways, Rabbi Zaltzman suggested.

The variety of ideas presented by applicants was impressive, he continued. They spanned fields as diverse as health and wellness, energy and the environment, arts and culture, technology, leisure and tourism, electrical engineering and rehabilitation.

Rabbi Mendel Zaltzman

Rabbi Zaltzman said there were plenty of applicants from the Russian Jewish community. Today's young Russians are far different than the earlier waves of immigrants, who were "an intellectual community," but not necessarily ready to try their hands at business.

"Younger Russians have the potential that wasn't there before," he said.

Russian Jewish community leaders "want us to provide services that we haven't in the past," he continued. "That is, get people into business at a high level. In doing so, "We're creating the leaders of the next generation."

Organizers were pleasantly surprised when they received 125 applications for the 15 available spots, said Ressin.

"It was great for the first time."

At the end of the first three-month session, participants will make a pitch for up to $500,000 in funding.

Ultimately, it's hoped there will be two sessions a year accommodating 20 people at a time. There are also plans to expand to other Canadian schools, Ressin said.

Reading a new Torah at the new year

The Five Books of Moses.
Robert Alter
Norton

The High Holidays synagogue services offer an annual re-encounter with two key texts from the Hebrew Bible – the story of Abraham's binding of Isaac on a mountain in Moriah, and the opening of Genesis depicting Creation. Each synagogue denomination prayer book presents its own version of these, in a variety of translations, but synagogue-goers, if they remain with a congregation for decades, will see the same rendering of the biblical Hebrew again and again. Some siddurim provide a form of scholarly context in footnotes, and there is always the possibility that a rabbi's sermon will approach these readings in surprising ways.

Robert Alter's The Five Books of Moses: A Translation with Commentary views these texts in a fresh light, by experimenting with a different rendering in English and via explanatory notes with unusual expansiveness. Alter, a professor of Hebrew and comparative literature at the University of California, Berkeley, has devoted a good portion of his scholarly energy to re-translating the Jewish biblical canon while treating it to his own idiosyncratic presentation of the Bible as literary art. Earlier projects include The David Story and The Book of Psalms, the latter being a provocative effort to reclaim Psalms from their familiar, one might say Christianized, context.

Alter's translation counters the effect of translations that downplay the original character of Hebrew poetry and cultural context. In the case of the Psalms, Alter would have us remember their use in the ritual life of the Jerusalem Temple, and the fact that they were once sung to music, though our knowledge of the instruments on which that music was played is scant.

Reading Alter on the Psalms is eye-opening and offers detailed consideration of the context and language in which the poems were written. But there is in Alter's translation enough odd, even willfully strange, language that readers may not be entirely convinced that his revision of the Psalms should offer the last word on how to read and become intimate with them today.

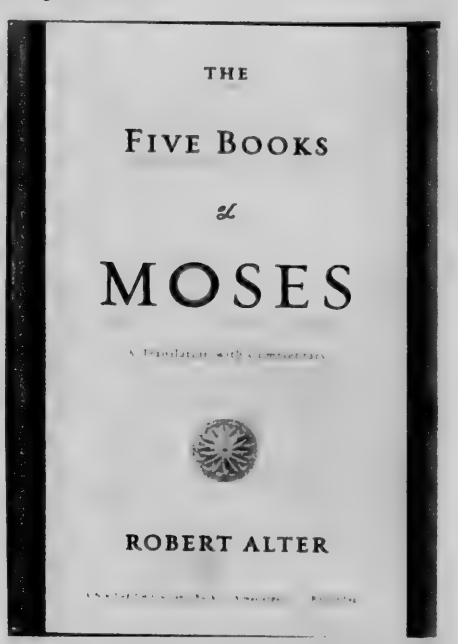
This is not the case with his Five Books of Moses, which utterly entertains, convinces and edifies. Once again, translation is key to Alter's goals, as he insists on attentiveness to the sound and structure of biblical Hebrew, to word choice, repetition, the use of dialogue and the presence in the text of contradictory and even unintelligible elements. Alter's rendering of the Torah may not seem as aggressively different as did his Psalms, but this may arise from the fact that more stridently Christianized rendering of Psalms have become dominant in our popular culture.

A glance at what Alter does with the beginning of the Creation story is revealing: "When God began to create heaven and earth, and the earth then was welter and waste and darkness over the deep and God's breath hovering over the waters, God said, 'Let there be light.'" Gone is the conventional notion of God's "spirit" reflected in the "face" of the water; the motif of "welter and waste" replaces the more common "unformed and void" and is closer to the unusual Hebrew words "tohu wabohu."

The middle section of this verse is reshaped as a long Whitmanian line calling for sustained breath to maintain the line's rhythm. These shifts change a great deal. Imagery, the idea of the divine and the way the words must be uttered are all addressed anew.

In the chapter presenting the would-be sacrifice of Isaac, translation is not so pointedly revisionary. But Alter's commentary on this difficult story opens both midrashic and original possibilities for understanding the motivation and outcome of Abraham's actions. In this, Alter teases out what might be understood to be divine motivation and human reaction.

In his introduction to Genesis, Alter highlights aspects of the text that we may not consider as we encounter it being read from a synagogue bimah. He argues that Genesis strives to "make clear that procreation, far from being an automatic biological process, is fraught with dangers, and is constantly under the threat of being deflected or cut off. Abraham must live long years with the seeming mockery of a divine promise of numberless offspring as he and his wife advance childless into hoary old age. Near the end of the book, Jacob's whole family fears it may perish in the great famine, and Joseph must assure his brothers that God has sent him ahead of them to Egypt in order to sustain life. Genesis begins with the making of heaven and earth and all life, and ends with the image of a mummy – Joseph's – in a coffin."



Alter wants us to recognize how a family history reflects "larger, universal history," as well as the way that the patriarchal stories connect with the "wider reach of known cultures." In these characteristics he sees great similarity between the Bible and such literary masterpieces as Shakespeare's plays and Greek tragic drama.

In his detailed commentary, Alter concentrates on how literary facets of the Bible further its goals. He points to the symmetry of the Joseph story; to the way that important figures' first utterances reveal their character and motive; to the way that key motifs recur, linking disparate parts of the text; and he highlights the way that action and dialogue dramatize and energize narrative.

Alter's approach tempts the reader to go back to theatre and film renderings of biblical stories to see how much was made of such serendipitous material by dramatists and screenwriters. Surely Alter's Esau, with his order to Jacob to serve him up "some of this red red stuff, for I am famished," would lead a casting director straight to a mid-career Gérard Depardieu.

Alter's translation renders the Bible new in uncanny ways, as it highlights how much of what is familiar in earlier translations demands revoicing and even a share of patient relearning. As Alter reconsiders "the Torah as literary expression," he insists on a return to Hebrew sources, a conservative approach whose outcome is a radical rethinking of how we read and take pleasure in the Torah.

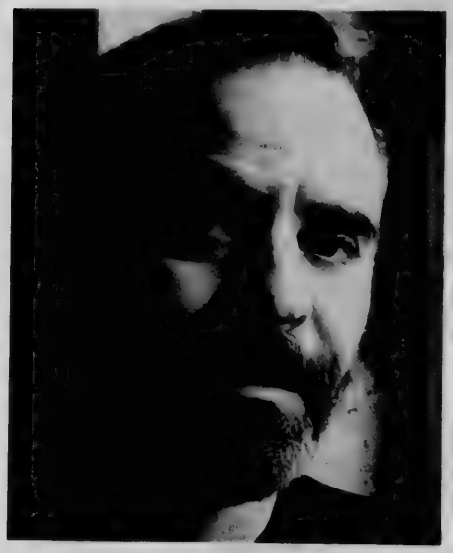
Literary success bittersweet after author's death

Barbara Silverstein
Special to the CJN

Love, Dishonor, Marry, Die, Cherish, Perish (Doubleday Canada), David Rakoff's first novel, has been garnering glowing reviews and the book has been on the New York Times bestseller list since mid-July.

But this literary triumph is bittersweet. Rakoff died of cancer in New York City last summer at the age of 47. The launch of his new book took place just weeks before his first yahrzeit in mid-August.

The Montreal-born Rakoff, an essayist, visual artist and actor, was known for his wit and humour.



David Rakoff

His three earlier books of essays, all published by Doubleday, Half Empty (2010), Don't Get Too Comfortable (2005) and Fraud (2001) were all best sellers. He was also a regular contributor to the radio show This American Life.

But the author chartered new literary territory with his final work: Love, which is entirely written in rhyming couplets.

This American epic spans much of the 20th century. The main characters face challenges that reflect the zeitgeist of their time. For instance, Helen a career girl in the '50s, endures a failed affair with her married boss.

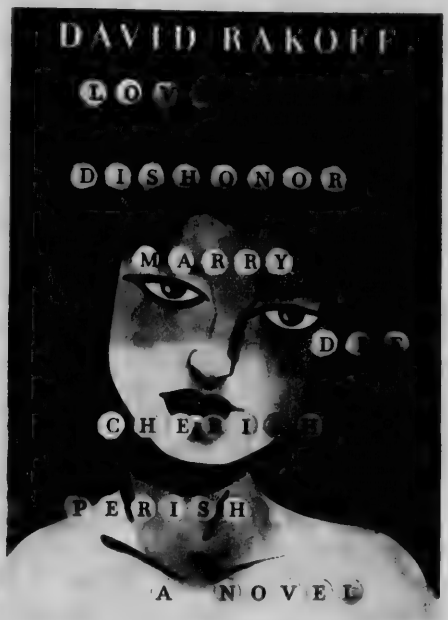
Her cousin Clifford hides his homosexuality when he comes of age in the '40s, but he experiences sexual freedom in San Francisco during the '60s and '70s.

Rakoff deftly covers the Great Depression, the post-war era, the '60s, the AIDS epidemic and the crass materialism of the last few decades.

Although his characters experience pain and disillusionment, Love is an entertaining read. The poignancy of narrative is laced with humour and wit.

Ruth Rakoff-Bellman says the novel is rooted in her brother's view of the world as a "harsh place," but she stresses that his modus operandi was "to combat the grim realities of life" through his art and acts of kindness. "He was generous to a fault."

She notes that pitching a novel written in rhyme was not an easy sell; the publisher was not sure how to market such a book. So her brother hatched a deal. He signed a two-book contract.



He agreed to do a book of essays after he completed his novel, but died before that project got underway.

He had also planned to do all the illustrations for Love, but he grew too sick, Rakoff-Bellman says. "He was so immensely talented. He could draw. He could write. He could act."

She describes her younger brother as a gifted child. "He was smart from the get-go. David was more that bright. He was on a different plane.

"He had an oral, visual and photographic memory. He would hear lines of dialogue and remember them. He had a stage presence, even as a young boy."

Rakoff, the youngest of three, grew up in Toronto. His South African-born parents, Gina and Vivian Rakoff are both physicians, though careers in the arts do run in his family. His older brother, Simon, is a comedian and Rakoff-Bellman is the author of When My World was Very Small (Random House 2010).

Rakoff went to Bialik Hebrew Day School and Forest Hill Collegiate Institute. After he graduated from Columbia University he remained in New York City.

With his U.S. residency came the challenges of health insurance and immigration, which is why Rakoff, despite his literary success, held on to his day jobs in publishing, Rakoff-Bellman explains.

"It took him many years before he had the courage to become a full-time writer."

Rakoff maintained close ties with his family. There were many trips back and forth between Toronto and New York, but the visits to her brother's adopted city during the last year were extremely painful, Rakoff-Bellman recalls.

His family was with him during the last two weeks of his life. They returned last October for a memorial and in July they came back for the launch of Love.

Rakoff-Bellman confesses that she was worried about the sales campaign for the book. "One of the realities of marketing is that an author goes on book tours.

"As brilliant a writer as David was, he was equally as good as a reader and performer. The conundrum was, how to market a book not promoted by him."

She participated in the unusual launch of her brother's book last month. On July 17 a large group gathered in the upstairs room of the Barnes and Noble bookstore at Union Square, "Davey's old stomping ground."

Love was read out loud by 62 people, among them, Rakoff-Bellman, her father and her older brother.

"The room holds 400 people. Between the audience and the readers the place was packed. And there were another 200 people who were turned away.

"I was worried that it wouldn't come across well. But the whole thing was riveting. It was a special event and really a beautiful tribute. But celebrating this achievement without Davey there was bittersweet."

Gabi Epstein starts in theatre fundraiser

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

The Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company kicks off its seventh season with a fundraising production of Funny Girl in Concert starring Toronto-based actress and singer Gabi Epstein in the title role.

Directed by HGJTC's co-artistic director Avery Saltzman, with conductor Mark Camilleri as musical director, the one-night-only event will take place Sept. 30.

Epstein, who will portray the late comedian Fanny Brice (1891-1951), made famous by Barbra Streisand in the movie Funny Girl, will be reunited with actor Shawn Wright, who will take on the role of Brice's husband, Nicky Arnstein. The two performed in HGJTC's show To Life, for which Epstein was nominated for a Dora Award. Also performing at the Funny Girl fundraiser are Eddie Glen, Victor Young, Theresa Tova and Paula Wilson, to name a few.

"In this concert version, we are reading the whole script and singing the whole score, but instead of doing it with costumes and sets, there are going to be five microphones and music stands," Epstein explained. "We will be in character the whole time, but singing the songs and reading the lines just by standing at the microphones.

"These musical concerts aren't done for every single show, but generally they're done for the shows that are quite expensive to set up. Also, the show has to have enough meat in the music and the book to stand up to just being read without all the glitz and glam. A 25-piece orchestra will be our set."

Epstein said Brice was most famous for being the first to introduce people to Yiddish comedy and bring it to the vaudeville world, adding that she grew to become one of the most famous vaudevillians of her day. Ironically, Epstein's first professional acting job was in the one-woman show Fanny Brice for Smile Theatre, written by Lezlie Wade. So she's well versed on the life of this funny lady both on and off the stage.

"The story is really beautiful. In the play, they really highlight her real life, which wasn't nearly as glamorous as her life on the stage," Epstein said. "She went through some really trying times with her husband and what was going on in the world at that time. It has a tragic clown element to it. One of my favourite things about the show is that she is a consummate performer, so she will put away everything that is going on in her life and be that consummate performer on the stage, but nothing is really ever as it seems.

"This will be a fun night for the Jewish theatre, and they are like a second family to me. It will be really exciting, and I hope they get tons of people out and that they make a ton of money because I would love to continue working for them. I think they are great for this city."

Epstein has graced a number of stages since her first opportunity to portray Fanny Brice. Her work has taken her to New York, Orlando, Montreal, Ottawa and the Caribbean. She has also made her mark in the cabaret world, both in Canada and in the United States, including in New York City's Algonquin Hotel and at the cabaret hotspot Don't Tell Mama, for which the Times Square Chronicles named her the Top Cabaret Act of 2012.

Gabi Epstein

Epstein will also be performing in HGJTC's There's No Business Like Irving Berlin on Nov. 3, alongside Arlene Duncan, Sterling Jarvis, Sheila McCarthy and Camilla Scott, in a show directed once again by Saltzman.

Filmmaker gave up the lab to make movies

30–Love wins best Canadian short at Montreal film fest

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

Emerging Canadian filmmaker Richard Stark's new comedy 30-Love beat out 35 other Canadian films, winning best Canadian short film at the 2013 Montreal World Film Festival in early September. Stark wrote, directed and produced the project.

Considering that the award-winning filmmaker almost never even pursued his dreams of a film career, he's come quite a long way. Before attending the University of Southern California School of Cinematic Arts, he studied biology at the University of Toronto. After a year of conducting research in a lab, he realized his heart really lay in what he loved to do since he was a child: telling stories through films.

"I made my first movie when I was 11, and ever since then, I've been in love with making movies," said Stark, now 37. "I'm in love with storytelling."

Richard Stark accepts the best Canadian short film award at the 2013 Montreal World Film Festival.

Growing up in Toronto, Stark always heard stories about his grandparents' escape from Nazi-occupied eastern Europe. "Their stories really inspired me and gave me a natural love for storytelling."

Indeed, the premiere of his film at the Montreal World Film Festival was especially exciting for Stark's 87-year-old grandmother, who dreamed of seeing her grandson's name on the big screen, and it marked the first time in 37 years that she returned to Montreal, the city her family immigrated to after escaping Europe.

"I feel touched to have my family return to the city that took them in, a place that represented freedom and a new life," he said.

It isn't the first time that Stark's work has gotten recognition. His film Afternoon Tea, about a religious Indian man who disowned his daughter for marrying outside her culture and finally meets his grandson for the first time, played at the Toronto International Film Festival in 2011 and received a 2012 Leo Award nomination for best screenwriting in a short drama. Another one of his comedies, An Innocent Family, also won him best director at the 2011 Los Angeles Comedy Festival.

Whether he's making comedies or dramatic films, there's one thing that ties all of them together: his commitment to telling stories about real issues while portraying them in a natural way.

"I like realistic performances, stories about people and what makes them tick and what motivates them," Stark said. "I like telling human stories."

His latest film, 30-Love, was based on his own experiences growing up in Toronto. The film tells the story of a man, Bruce, who drags his wife, Jodi, to join a fancy country club, even though they can't really afford it. To be eligible, they must impress two of the club's board members, an obnoxious, wealthy couple who have everything that Bruce thinks he wants.

The couples play a "friendly" tennis game, which quickly escalates into something much more serious than that, as Bruce realizes his marriage is crumbling and is more important than a tennis match or fancy country clubs.

"The ritzy tennis club in 30-Love was inspired by similar clubs that I was occasionally invited to as a guest in Toronto. Tennis can be an ego-driven sport, but when you add status and money to the equation, you can get some very pretentious personalities that I wanted to capture in a comedy," said Stark.

"My goal was to have the actors truthfully and realistically capture this kind of snobbish behaviour."

Winning the award earlier this month was extremely exciting for Stark, and a validation of his hard work.

"It was so exciting, to be in front of hundreds of people and accept the award… to have that recognition that audiences love the movie and really enjoyed it," he said. "When I'm making a movie, I'm making it for the audience."

Stark is already at work on new projects. He's written a psychological drama about a South Asian girl who commits suicide, and her traditional parents blame their other daughter for what happened. It's currently being filmed in Vancouver.

He's also working on his first feature film directorial debut for his script My Son's Big Bris, which was a finalist at the 2011 Los Angeles Comedy Festival.

"I'm hoping that this prestigious award will bring attention to that feature script, which is similar in tone," Stark said.

After all, there's nothing he loves doing more than making movies.

"I've never looked back, I've always loved it. I hope I'll be doing it for the rest of my life."

Always the victim

Dear Ella,

I've recently come to a painful realization. My mom, the person whom I've trusted my entire life – the friend, mentor and parent who taught me right from wrong – is flawed.

I know everyone has problems, but I always pictured my mom with a halo over her head. She consistently said and did the right things, but it seemed like time after time, life just served her a bowl of pits.

This epiphany came to me in one of my lectures, when my psych prof said something that turned on a light bulb in my head.

I finally realized my mom has been playing the victim her entire life and taking me along for the ride.

I don't think she's done this on purpose. She really believes that the entire world has done her wrong. Incident after incident is always someone else's fault.

She divorced my dad when I was young and made me feel like he was always trying to pull one over on her. I never went to camp with my friends because it was his fault. Every time there was an argument between them, it was always my dad's fault, because, as she used to say, "He thinks about himself, before you."

Then she would play the righteous card by saying something like, "It's not his fault, that's just the way his parents raised him." As a result, the relationship I have with my dad has always been strained.

Likewise, the relationship with my relatives on my mom's side became rocky, because one day mom was speaking to them and the next day she wasn't. Of course, it was never anything she did. It was always Auntie Becky's fault for not inviting her somewhere, or she heard through the grapevine that Uncle Arnie told some kind of lie about her.

I have been avoiding her calls and haven't seen her in weeks. I don't know how I'm going to get past this.

Mom has always been a rock for me. I tell her everything and trust her to have my best interests at heart. Now I've come to realize it's her best interests that come first.

Always the Victim

Ask Ella
By Ella Burakowski

Dear Always the Victim

There's something called a "victim mentality." There are people who suffer from the belief that they're always morally right and are the victims of an injustice perpetrated against them, through no fault of their own.

People like this rarely see themselves as being responsible for their own choices and are always playing the "poor-me" card. Sometimes they come off as bullies, because they push back too hard.

Your mom has probably been doing this her entire life, possibly since childhood, so this is not going to be easy for her to change or even recognize.

If you have a good relationship, you may be able to communicate your concerns by using concrete examples, but you'd best be ready for an argument. The goal of this communication is not to "fix" her per se, but to plant the seed.

Chances are she'll dismiss your words as nonsense, but once you've put it out there, she can't ignore it.

After your discussion, make sure she understands how her actions have affected you. She needs to restore her self-worth and realize that if something doesn't go her way, it doesn't mean she's a failure, it means she's human.

People who are always victims have no idea how destructive their behaviour is to everyone they're connected to. Their inability to take responsibility for their actions means others have to pick up the pieces, and this can and does ruin relationships. It's a difficult cycle to break, but it's toxic to all if it continues.

Once your mom has admitted to it, or even accepts the possibility that you may be on to something, she can stop blaming others and accept responsibility for the path her own life has taken.

In the meantime, you need to repair some of the damage this has caused to your relationships with other family members.

Start with your dad and work from there. Create your own bonds and take back some of what you've lost.

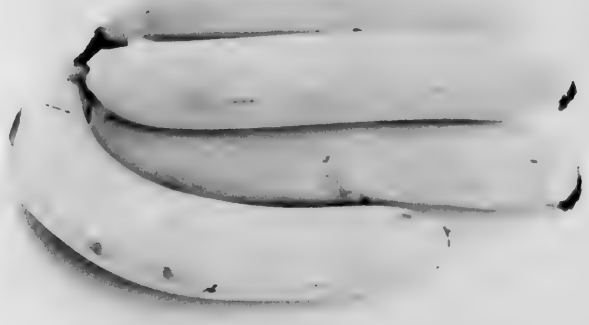
Have a banana and boost your energy



Sue Epstein
Special to The CJN

If you want a quick fix for flagging energy levels, there's no better snack than a banana. Containing three natural sugars – sucrose, fructose and glucose – as well as fibre, a banana gives an instant, sustained and substantial boost of energy.

Research has proven that just two bananas provide enough energy for a strenuous, 90-minute workout. No wonder the banana is the number 1 fruit among the world's leading athletes. But energy isn't the only way a banana can help us keep fit.

This is because bananas contain tryptophan, a type of protein that the body converts into serotonin, which is known to make you relax, improve your mood and generally make you feel happier.

GOLDEN BANANA CAKE

A good way to use up overripe bananas, this cake is delicious served warm with vanilla ice cream, although it probably won't last long enough to get cool. It's simple to make, moist and not too sweet. A plus for the busy mother, short on time but wanting to bake treats for the family.

1 cup all-purpose flour
1/8 tsp. baking powder
pinch of baking soda
1/4 cup unsalted butter, softened
1 1/2 tbsp. olive oil
3/4 cup sugar
4 large eggs
1 extra-ripe medium banana, peeled and mashed
1 cup chopped pecans, optional

Preheat the oven to 325. Butter an 8-1/2x4-1/2x2-1/2-in. loaf pan. Dust the pan with flour, tapping out the excess.

Sift together the flour, baking powder and baking soda. In the bowl of an electric mixer fitted with the paddle attachment, mix together the butter, olive oil and sugar at low speed.

Increase the speed to medium and add the eggs one at a time, beating well after each addition. Mix in the mashed banana. Add the flour mixture and mix just until combined. Scrape the batter into the prepared pan, smoothing the top with a spatula. Bake the cake for 55 to 60 minutes, until the top is golden brown and a toothpick inserted in the centre of the cake comes out clean.

Cool the cake in the pan on a wire rack for 15 minutes. Unmould the cake and cool completely on the rack. Store in an airtight container at room temperature for 3 days, 1 week refrigerated or 2 months frozen. Makes 8 servings.

BANANA-STUFFED FRENCH TOAST WITH STREUSEL TOPPING

Wow! This recipe is rich and decadent, but definitely worth the extra trips to the gym. The banana stuffing portion of the recipe will become a staple in your kitchen. It's wonderful to sweeten oatmeal, for example. Great for a weeknight dinner. Delicious even without the streusel topping.

PEACOCK VEGETABLES

2-4 zucchini, cut into ½"strips
2 yellow squash, cut into ½" strips
2 purple onions, cut into 1/8's
2 red peppers, cut into ½" strips
2 yellow peppers, cut into ½" strips
2 green peppers, cut into ½" strips
8 cloves garlic, thinly sliced
4 tbsp. fresh parsley, minced
2 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
2 Tbsp. olive oil • 2 tsp. dried oregano
1 tsp. salt • 1/2 tsp. pepper

Place onions, squash, zucchini, peppers and garlic in a bowl and toss well. Combine parsley, vinegar, oil, oregano, salt and pepper in a jar. Cover tightly and shake well. Pour over vegetables and toss. Spoon vegetable mixture into an ungreased roasting pan. Bake at 425° for 20 min., stirring every 5 min. Serve warm or at room temperature.

2 tbsp. plus 1/4 cup unsalted butter
2 tbsp. plus 1/2 cup sugar
2 tbsp. water
2 large ripe bananas, peeled, cut into 1/2-in.-thick rounds
1 1-lb. unsliced loaf challah, ends trimmed, bread cut into 6 slices (each about 1-1/2 in. thick)
2 cups milk (do not use low-fat or nonfat)
6 large eggs
2 1/2 tsp. ground cinnamon
1/4 tsp. vanilla extract
1 1/2 cups thinly sliced almonds, toasted
1/4 cup (packed) golden brown sugar
1/4 cup quick-cooking oats
2 tbsp. all purpose flour
maple syrup

Melt 2 tbsp. butter in heavy large skillet over medium heat. Add 2 tbsp. sugar and 2 tbsp. water and stir until sugar dissolves. Continue stirring until mixture is foamy, about 2 minutes. Add bananas, cook until tender, stirring occasionally, about 5 minutes. Transfer to small bowl; cool. (Can be prepared 4 hours ahead. Cover and chill.)

Preheat oven to 350. Using small sharp knife, cut 2-in. long slit in 1 side of each bread slice, cutting 3/4 of way through bread and creating pocket that leaves 3 sides of bread intact. Divide banana mixture equally among pockets in bread. Whisk milk, eggs, 1/2 tsp. cinnamon, vanilla and 1/2 cup sugar in large bowl to blend. Pour into large glass baking dish. Place bread in egg mixture and let soak 10 minutes, turning occasionally.

Place almonds in shallow bowl. Carefully remove bread from egg mixture and coat both sides with almonds. Place bread on heavy large baking sheet. Mix brown sugar, oats, flour and remaining 2 tsp. cinnamon in medium bowl. Add remaining 1/4 cup butter and rub in, using fingertips, until moist clumps form. Sprinkle topping over bread.

Bake french toast until topping is golden brown and filling is hot, about 25 minutes. Transfer toast to plates. Serve hot with maple syrup. Makes 6 servings.

Vets recall trauma of Yom Kippur War

Mira Shefa was only 19 when she was tasked with admitting and comforting the hundreds of dying and injured soldiers who poured into Soroka Medical Center.

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

As the 40th anniversary of the Yom Kippur War approached, it occurred to me that I'd never heard the details of my parents' service as young IDF soldiers during one of the most infamous conflicts in Jewish history.

So when I sat down with them recently for an interview, I was surprised to learn that their experiences were more dramatic – and even traumatic – than I had ever imagined. I also learned that they harbour anger toward Israeli leaders who they say failed them four decades ago.

Special Feature

Mira and Hanan Shefa still struggle to grasp how the Jewish state was caught so off-guard by an Egyptian and Syrian attack, on Oct. 6, 1973, resulting in one of the costliest wars in its history.

The 19-day war began with a surprise attack by Egyptian forces that advanced virtually unopposed across the Bar-Lev Line, a barrier to prevent the Egyptian army from crossing the Suez Canal that was considered to be impenetrable.

As a majority of Israeli soldiers had been released to observe Yom Kippur, the barrier was left scarcely manned.

As a result, in the early hours of the war, Israel suffered hundreds of casualties, and – despite the fact that it won the war – the perception that Israel was invincible following the stunning 1967 Six Day War victory was at best shaken, and at worst, destroyed.

In the months that followed the war, which claimed nearly 2,700 Israeli lives, a commission of inquiry was formed to investigate how then-prime minister Golda Meir and her military intelligence had operated in the days leading up to the conflict.

Excerpts from that commission were released last month, confirming that intelligence failures, coupled with Meir's inexperience and timidity, contributed to the Arab armies' early success.

Netanyahu tells Obama 'the truth' on Iran

The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was expected to meet with U.S. President Barack Obama on Monday to present an intelligence report stating that Iran has enough enriched uranium to produce a nuclear weapon, according to Britain's Sunday Times.

Netanyahu left Saturday night for a four-day visit to the United States, vowing to expose "the truth" in the wake of Iranian President Hasan Rouhani's recent overtures to the United States.

The dossier also states that Iran is developing a nuclear detonator at the Parchin site and conducting ongoing tests of the Shahab-3 ballistic missile, while producing plutonium at another site, Arak, the report said.

CANADA

Travel Record

TORONTO — Despite regional turmoil, Canadian tourism to Israel reached a record high in August 2013, with the arrival of 6,106 travellers, an eight per cent increase over the same period in 2012, the Israel Government Tourist Office said last week. Some 2.3 million travellers from around the world arrived in Israel between January and August 2013, matching last year's record, and a seven per cent increase over 2011.

$5M Health Donation

CALGARY — Edmonton businessman Irving Kipnes and his wife, psychologist Dianne Kipnes, last week donated $5 million to the University of Calagary and the Phoebe and Joan Snyder Institute for Chronic Diseases for a new lymphatic imaging suite and to fund new research. The gift stemmed from Dianne's 2009 fight with lymphedema, a chronic infection that causes excessive swelling and is a side effect of some cancer treatments. The couple – who've given millions to health, arts, education and Jewish causes – made the donation after learning the condition affects 60 per cent of cancer patients but isn't well researched.

WORLD

Cda. Extradites Man

JERUSALEM — An Israeli man who fled to Canada in 2003 after being convicted of raping and sexually assaulting a 13-year-old girl was extradited to Israel last week, the Israeli Justice Ministry said. Haim Cohen, now 37, was indicted in Jerusalem in December 2002 and agreed to a plea bargain, but fled the country with his wife and three children before he was sentenced. Israeli police said Cohen, though originally secular, lived as a haredi Jew in Canada. He managed to evade authorities until he was located in 2011 via a tip and finally arrested last April.

Ex-Theatre Mogul Seeks Reinstatement

TORONTO — Laywers for fallen theatre mogul Garth Drabinsky were in Federal Court last week trying to get his Order of Canada membership back after he lost it while serving part of a five-year sentence for fraud.

Garth Drabinsky

Drabinsky, who is on day parole but wasn't in court, wants the decision of the Order's advisory council to be declared unlawful. His lawyers argued the governor general was "misadvised" that he was given equal opportunity to present his case to keep the award, which he received in 1995, Canadian Press reported.

He contends that because he was in jail, he didn't have access to the documents he needed to defend himself when the council wrote to him in the summer of 2012 advising him it was considering removing him from the Order and asked him for submissions.

Drabinsky and business partner Myron Gotlieb were convicted in 2009 for fraud in the accounting at Livent, the live-theatre company they co-founded that went bankrupt as a result of their scheme.

The council responded that it had no obligation to extend the 30 days it gave Drabinsky to respond, and that he submitted a 17-page letter in his defence, which, among other things, noted the award isn't given for good behaviour and that disgraced sprinter Ben Johnson is still a member of the Order.

Jail Time For Threats

PARIS — A man who made death threats against the Jewish school in Toulouse, France, where Mohammed Merah killed four people last year was ordered jailed for a year. Lucien Abdelrhafor, 20, also received an additional year's suspended jail term Sept. 23 for phoning in the threats Sept. 16 to the Ohr Hatorah school. He reportedly told a secretary, "I am Mohammed Merah's cousin and I'm coming over tonight to kill you." The claim was false, French Jewish officials said.

University of Haifa to honour former PM

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Paul Martin has been out of politics for five years, but he still keeps a close watch on international affairs.

The situation in Syria concerns him, particularly whether there is sufficient Western resolve to make Syrian strongman Bashar Assad pay the price for violating "red lines" over his use of chemical weapons.

"Assad has got to see that he can't take these actions without very severe repercussions," the former prime minister stated.

Speaking before the United States and Russia began negotiating a deal to strip Syria of its chemical arsenal, Martin said, "I believe action should be taken and Canada should judge the quality of that action. If the United States and/or France take action, we should support them, diplomatically and politically."

"I don't think we should be standing back here."

Martin, who served as prime minister from 2003 to 2006 as well as nine years as finance minister, was best known for his domestic achievements – taming the deficit, negotiating to address aboriginal issues, passing same sex marriage legislation and pledging billions in federal funds for health care.

Since his retirement, he's also been involved in international issues. He chairs the Congo Basin Forest Fund, which addresses poverty issues in 10 African nations, and he's served as an adviser to the International Monetary Fund.

Later this month, the University of Haifa will confer on Martin the degree of doctor of philosophy (honoris causa) at an event at the Fairmont Hotel. Proceeds from the dinner, to be held Sunday Oct. 20, will establish the Paul Martin Scholarship Fund "for bright, disadvantaged students" at the university.

The dinner is expected to attract 600 people and will mark the kickoff of the campaign to raise funds for the scholarship fund.

"I'm a huge admirer of the university and I have been for a long time," Martin said in a telephone interview from Montreal. "I think in so many ways Haifa [University] represents the principles we all share."

The admiration is mutual. In an email interview from Israel, Amos Shapira, president of the university, said Martin's "values coincide with the values of the University of Haifa... in the advancement of educational excellence, tolerance and entrepreneurship skills."

Martin was chosen for the honour because of his accomplishments in government, particularly in spearheading "the largest increases in Canadian history in the federal government's support for

Rouhani PR blitz masks lies

As Iranian President Hassan Rouhani prepared last week for his appearance before the United Nations, speculation was rampant about whether the dovish signals he had been sending represented a genuine shift in Iranian government attitudes, foremost toward its nuclear program. Or was his new, moderate tone a clever tactic to lure the West into easing the economic sanctions that have been hurting his country?

Rouhani has been involved in what everyone agreed was a "charm offensive" including an extensive interview with NBC's Ann Curry and an opinion piece in the Washington Post – just two elements in a well-thought-out campaign to demonstrate to the international community that the corrosive, combative bombast of the previous president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, is a thing of the past.

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

For many, Rouhani's rhetoric has indeed charmed and left them viewing Israel as "hardline" by insisting that Rouhani and Iran are not to be trusted.

In the Sept. 22 Times of Israel, columnist Raphael Ahren explained this annoyance: "Iran has never sought – and will never seek – a nuclear weapon, Rouhani promised last week on an American television network, nor does it 'seek war with any country.' These words are music to American ears. If Netanyahu considers them to be utterly disingenuous, and he plainly does, simply saying 'I don't believe him,' or words to that effect, isn't sufficient anymore. Sweet-talking, reasonable-sounding, bereobed Rouhani is a lot tougher to discredit than the Holocaust-denying, gay-bashing, unkempt Ahmadinejad."

Speaking of Holocaust-denial, Curry asked Rouhani directly if he agreed with or repudiated Ahmadinejad's position. Here was the perfect opportunity for Rouhani, who had just sent Rosh Hashanah greetings to "all Jews" to show that he really meant it. Instead he sidestepped the question, saying meekly "I'm not a historian, I'm a politician," as if that excused his refusal to acknowledge one of the world's most-documented facts.

It was perhaps Rouhani's reference to "all Jews" that led Jeffrey Simpson to assume, in his Sept. 23 Globe and Mail column, that Rouhani had "sent greetings to Israel." That's taking Rouhani's gesture several steps too far. Rouhani did not make what would have amounted to a hugely important political breakthrough. Like all Iranian leaders, he refuses to recognize Israel, calling it, in the Curry interview, "an occupier and usurper government." (In the Iranian government view, there are Jews who just happen to live in an area of the Middle East that is illegally occupied by Zionists on what is properly Islamic land.)

There are other parts of that interview that merit careful attention when evaluating his truthfulness and sincerity.

Curry repeatedly asked about Iran's military involvement in Syria. Rouhani kept insisting that Iran is only providing "humanitarian" assistance.

Curry was persistent: "It is widely perceived by some governments in the world that Iran is providing more than humanitarian aid in Syria. Can you categorically deny now that Iran is providing military aid to Syria?"

Rouhani (appearing frustrated): "I may again answer the question. But don't you think that you are repeating this question for the third time?"

The evidence is indisputable that Iran's Revolutionary Guard Quds force is deeply involved in Syrian President Bashar Assad's carnage, abetted also by Iran's proxy force, Hezbollah.

At most, Rouhani objects to the use of chemical weapons. Yet, as highly respected Iran analyst Ray Takeyh wrote in the Los Angeles Times: "It is not enough for Rouhani to condemn the use of chemical weapons in Syria. Is he prepared to withdraw the Revolutionary Guard contingents that have done much to buttress Assad's brutality?"

The question here is that if, in his charm offensive, Rouhani refuses to repudiate Holocaust denial and lies about the nature of Iran's involvement in Syria, what else – including Iran's nuclear ambitions – is he dissembling about?

Still, a great many people, including many Americans, are war-weary and skeptical about unsuccessful foreign military adventures. They're deeply concerned about their massive domestic budget deficits and high unemployment and, whatever the justified concerns, they want to give diplomacy with Iran a chance.

We can't have it both ways

Jewish life in Canada is thriving. Support for Israel within the political sector frequently prompts descriptions of Canada as "Israel's best friend in the world." Despite the financial challenges, Jewish education across the country is a foundational community priority, with thousands of children enrolled. Philanthropic activity, although changing, is at an all-time high, and interest in our spiritual tradition is experiencing a true renaissance.

Indeed, there's much for which to be grateful. But not all is right. Advocacy challenges take many forms, testing the community's ability and will to confront them. They range from the ongoing initiative in Quebec to assert a zealously secular program to attempts to skew public discourse on, and understanding of, the Arab-Israeli conflict through the promotion of anti-Israel advertisements in the transit system, chronic "Israeli Apartheid Week" and boycott, divestment and sanctions efforts on campuses, attacks on Israel at Pride parades, and a slew of other issues. All of them – individually and collectively – generate frustration, tension, anxiety and, often times, an angry reaction that demands a response. As well they should.

The real question is what kind of response and what set of considerations should inform that response? This is where the Jewish community must make a choice, a serious choice with far-reaching implications. Effective advocacy demands that there can be no half measures, no hybrid approaches that draw from disparate strategic anchors. The binary option is this: undertaking a response that provides immediate, if unsustained emotional satisfaction, or embracing a strategic plan that seeks the long-term, meaningful advancement of the community's interests. There is no middle ground.

This isn't about "turning the other cheek" when Israel's legitimacy is challenged, even when that challenge contains misleading or deceitful vitriol. Rather, it's about understanding who the real targets of our advocacy efforts are and the effective strategies needed to secure their support. It isn't about feeling good or preaching to the converted. It's about exercising influence where it counts and when it counts.

While no one can doubt the sincerity or good intentions of those willing to man the ramparts at anti-Israel rallies, or those who try to out-shout or out-spend those bent on delegitimizing the Jewish state, there's every reason to question the efficacy of that approach. All of our experience suggests that, at best, such efforts only achieve an ephemeral sense of emotional satisfaction. Simply put, these tactics don't work. They don't change opinions, nor discredit our adversaries.

True advocacy is about extending influence and winning support among those not already committed. Effective advocacy is about successful outreach to new sources of support, not providing emotional reassurance to those already persuaded of the righteousness of our cause.

The Canadian Jewish community has something more to celebrate. It has developed an advocacy approach that's evidence-based and empirically tested, whose efficacy has not only been recognized by communities around the world – including Israeli institutions – but has been adopted by them as the foundation of their pro-Jewish, pro-Israel advocacy efforts as well. In facing our current inventory of challenges, we must decide what approach will drive our actions. If we can resist the instinctive temptation to lash out and hit back in favour of a tested, smart and effective strategic plan, we will achieve a great deal. And unlike feeble emotional reactions, that satisfaction will be enduring. Shimon Fogel

Values charter breaks the law

The Parti Québécois' proposed charter of Quebec values, which would forbid state employees from wearing what it calls "ostentatious" head gear, contravenes the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms and discriminates against non-Christians ("Jewish groups denounce Quebec values charter," The CJN, Sept. 18).

On its website, the Quebec government says the wearing of these "ostentatious" head coverings has an aspect of passive proselytism, which is incompatible with the neutrality of the state. That's gobbledygook. Proselytism by definition means the active attempt to persuade someone to change religions. Has anyone ever heard of someone converting just because they looked at someone else's head gear?

Of course, the crucifix in the National Assembly will remain, as it's not considered a religious symbol, but part of Quebec's Roman Catholic heritage. For that matter, so is the archbishop of Quebec's skullcap.

All this reminds me of the famous quote from George Orwell's Animal Farm. "All animals are equal, but some animals are more equal than others."

Something's definitely not kosher in the province of Quebec.

Charter prevents bias

The article "Jewish groups denounce Quebec values charter" (The CJN, Sept. 18) gives a strong impression that just about all the Jewish groups are strongly against the proposed Quebec values charter. Being a Jew by birth, I must belong to one of these groups, but I was never polled about my opinion on this subject.

Despite being an Ashkenazi Jew and even a Holocaust survivor, I disagree with the majority of opinions in this article. If I were dealing with a public service employee and needed a service or decision rendered, if the person belonged to a hostile group – this might include a devout Catholic, Muslim, or even a prominently religious Jew (because I don't wear a kippah) – and was wearing prominently their religious garb (which would tell me they are devoted to it), I would suspect them of having strong negative biases against me.

Employment in a position of influence is not a right, but a privilege. With very few exceptions, there is no universal entitlement to it – especially in Quebec.

Keep your eye on arts

Is Bill Gladstone feeling confined by his "Eye On Arts" reporting? He devoted more than half his Sept. 18 column to a "Political Corner," slamming the respected Canadians for Justice and Peace in the Middle East as "propagandistic," insulting its members as "ridiculously simplistic [with a] myopic view" of the region. Then he repeats his Aug. 1 column's serious omission that "relocat[ing] some Palestinians and Bedouins" actually includes forced relocation of tens of thousands of Israeli citizens without their consent.

Pity he misuses his space, presumably with the interim editor's consent, omitting many important events – from the last chance to see outstanding performances of Fiddler on the Roof and The Merchant of Venice at Stratford, to Itzhak Perlman's upcoming concerts with the Toronto Symphony and a Beth Tikvah lecture series on "Jews and Opera."

Arafat wrecked Oslo

Any objective observer would say the Oslo peace accords were wrecked in 2000 by then-Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat ("Twenty years later, debate on Oslo accords rages," The CJN, Sept. 18).

At the Camp David talks between then-U.S. president Bill Clinton, then-Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak and Arafat, the Palestinians were to get all of Gaza, 97 per cent of the West Bank (with an equivalent swap of Israeli land) and their capital in a shared Jerusalem. It was everything anyone could have dreamed of. But Arafat refused to sign, and he wouldn't make a counter-proposal. The problem was an "end-of-conflict" statement, which would not have left it open for future generations to finally "drive the Jews into the sea."

So, when he should have been building his new state, Arafat started the second intifadah, unleashing suicide bombers on innocent Israeli civilians in hotels, restaurants, universities and buses.

Now, as the two sides are again starting talks, we will soon see who is honourable and who is not. Hopefully, both sides will prove equal to the task.

Will Norway's government stem anti-Semitism's tide?

Jeffrey F. Barken
JNS.org

Earlier this month, conservative candidates in Norway won landslide elections, deposing the Labour party majority that had ruled for nearly a decade. Many are hopeful the new government will address social intolerance in Norway, including the rampant anti-Semitism affecting a population of nearly 2,000 Jews.

But Manfred Gerstenfeld, an Israeli author who has written extensively on the prejudices facing Norway's Jewish community, is skeptical that Norwegians will be able to forget their prejudices. He uses the phrase "part-time anti-Semitism" to describe common attitudes and to highlight the general public's susceptibility to bias.

"In its origins, Lutheranism promoted Jew hatred," Gerstenfeld told JNS.org, recalling Norway's long history of intolerance. "Norway was the last country in Europe to admit Jews in the mid-19th century."

At the heart of the new conservative coalition stands Erna Solberg, nicknamed "Iron Erna." Elected Sept. 9, she will succeed Jens Stoltenberg and will be Norway's second female prime minister.

Gerstenfeld argues that many discriminatory instincts and old-world anti-Semitic beliefs about Jews still influence perspectives on the modern Jewish community. He cites a study commissioned by the Oslo municipality in 2011 that found one-third of the Jewish children there are harassed physically or verbally at least two or three times a month, and that 38 per cent of Norwegians believe that Israel is a Nazi state.

"I have never heard of such figures before in western Europe," Gerstenfeld said.

Anders Behring Breivik's infamous 2011 terrorist attack confirmed the worst regarding intolerance in Norwegian society. Following the mass shooting at a Worker's Youth League camp that left 69 people dead, the facility was discovered to house vicious anti-Semitic and anti-Israel propaganda. Teenagers participating in the program prior to the attack were routinely subjected to an indoctrinating hate campaign.

Biased reporting on Israel has created a poisoned atmosphere in which outrageous political cartoons depicting Jews as Nazis circulate, and boycotts of Israel are common.

"It is widely known that the Norwegian media has been heavily subsidized by the Labour government," Norwegian author Hanne Nabintu Herland told JNS.org.

Herland also confirms the failure of the ousted Labour government to confront the problem of the anti-Semitic indoctrination of youths. "Nothing has been done to de-radicalize the Labour party's youth groups in the aftermath of Breivik," she says.

"Here in Norway, no one has reacted much to that. As far as I know, only one Norwegian, a prominent, internationally acclaimed ship owner and billionaire, Dan Odfjell, wrote an article where he spoke about the problem, but he was heavily attacked for 'slandering our youth groups with horrible words.'"

Thirty survivors who had been indoctrinated with hatred at the camp Breivik attacked became Labour candidates in the recent election.

The current influx of Muslim immigrants to Norway fuels additional anti-Israel sentiment.

"Jews suffer in two ways," Gerstenfeld said. "Some Muslims commit extreme anti-Semitic acts, and there are actions in society against circumcision. The Center Party, a smaller party in the defeated government, is in favor of prohibiting circumcision. The circumcision issue was only raised because of the Muslim presence."

Despite the culture clash, the indoctrination of Norway's youth and deep-seated misconceptions that have made life uncomfortable for Norwegian Jews, many believe the election results spell progress.

"Talk of the town is that the left has taken a tremendous blow," Rabbi Shaul Wilhelm, director of the Chabad-Lubavitch center in Oslo, told JNS.org. "We are cautiously optimistic. The hope is that the new government will take into account a broader picture of the Middle East and will provide educational opportunities that combat anti-Semitism."

According to Rabbi Wilhelm, Norway's anti-Semitism stems from ignorance.

"The majority of Norway's Jews are assimilated into the mainstream culture, and the population is extremely small. Most Norwegians, therefore, have never met a Jew," he said.

"Exposure to Jews is what you see in the media, and whatever is the tone of that media becomes the chorus."

Rabbi Wilhelm often advises his pupils and colleagues, "Tolerance is not a speech. It needs to be practised."

His message to the newly elected government calls for Norway's leaders to understand the sensitivities and intricacies of the Jewish People.

"We need them to accept responsibility for what is happening under their noses," Rabbi Wilhelm said. "Above all, we need to foster a dialogue."

The conservative agenda is ambitious. "The new government has promised to revise the heavily bureaucratic state administration, modernize the system, look at our failing school system, the hospitals, infrastructure and other areas that have been heavily neglected by Labour," Herland said. "They have also indicated that the relationship towards Israel will definitely change and that the funding of the left wing's many newspapers will be revised."

Herland said there has been "surprisingly wide support for Solberg's election among the [Norwegian] people."

"Erna Solberg is Norway's Angela Merkel: calm, kind, diplomatic and very tough," she said.

The view 31 minutes after a car bomb explosion in Oslo on July 22, 2011, one of Anders Behring Breivik's two terrorist attacks in Norway that day. Following Breivik's other attack, the mass shooting at a Worker's Youth League camp that left 69 people dead, the facility was discovered to house vicious anti-Semitic and anti-Israel propaganda.

Modesty and peaceful coexistence

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

The revolution is here, and its name is Lycra.

Swimming in a kibbutz pool in the upper Galilee in the fading days of summer, I noticed a wonderful array of women's bathing suits. Scattered among the itsy-bitsy models and the more sedate one-piece maillots were an impressive array of what has been termed modesty bathing suits.

I swam among a variety of languages and styles: women speaking Hebrew, Arabic, French or English and wearing bikinis and one-piece suits – what you'd find at any summer resort. But there were others: Hebrew-speaking women wearing skirts that covered knees and tops that covered elbows, with matching head-snoods, and Arab-speaking women wearing leggings and long-sleeved tunics with attached hoods – all made of lightweight and quick-drying swimwear fabric. They were splashing about with their children, their husbands and their friends, zipping down the water slide, diving off the pool's edge.

This isn't so much a fashion report as a meditation on social phenomena and the marketplace (although I admit to being fascinated by the fashion aspect, as well). You have a range of subcultures that place a value on female modesty, defined in a way that precludes women wearing conventional bathing suits any place where men might see them. At the same time, you have a country characterized by a warm climate, where people want to swim and engage in outdoor activities that may include hiking through waterfalls and streams. To borrow from a tawdry-titled popular song, girls just wanna have fun. Enter modesty bathing suits.

I spoke later to some Israeli young women who owned tzniut (or modesty) swimwear. Some only swam in women-only spaces. Others said that when they wore these bathing suits, they felt comfortable taking their children to swim even in pools and at beaches that aren't segregated by gender. They showed me their bathing wardrobes – which included Lycra skirts above, at or below knee-length, worn with Lycra shirts (sleeves to or past the elbow) and shorts; or tunics worn over capris. The swimsuits, they explained, were versatile – good for hiking, the gym or bicycling. Before the availability of these Lycra outfits, the women would hike in loose T-shirts and long cotton skirts over shorts, and take cooling plunges into natural pools or rivers fully clothed. Their clothes, they insisted, would dry reasonably quickly in the arid heat. But still, the wet clothes would drag and chafe, they recollected. Hiking was a far less comfortable experience for them than for men. But their modest swimsuits served well for both hiking and dipping, they explained.

O brave new world. Where there is a need, a market develops. There are myriad online sites selling modesty swimsuits, based in Israel and elsewhere. Most target a specific market – frum Jewish women, Muslim women or Christian women.

The Christian-oriented websites often explain the need for modest bathing wear. The suits shield women's bodies from "a bunch of men's eyes suffocating your every move," creating "respect." They "glorify God with my body," which must be saved for the "future husband." They avoid "stimulat[ing] a man in a way that we wouldn't wish."

The range of styles and of body parts covered vary most widely on these sites. They include loose maillots with higher necklines or thicker straps, as well as suits with short or medium-length sleeves and mid-thigh to knee-length skirts. Modesty, several sites explain, is a concept, not a set of rigid specifications. As one website puts it, the "Bible doesn't give exact guidelines."

By contrast, Jewish and Muslim-oriented sites rarely explain the need for these specially designed suits. Presumably, those who gravitate to them already understand. They also exemplify more codified ideas about what constitutes modesty. The Muslim-geared websites featured tunics over ankle-length pants – some fitted like leggings, others looser like sweatpants. With matching hoods, they left visible hands, feet and face. Some swim outfits were all black, others brightly coloured. The Jewish-geared websites had greater variety of style and exposure, appealing to different modesty benchmarks in the religious community.

It pleased me, that day that we were all in the pool together. Everyone wore the bathing suit they felt most appropriate. But we swam in the same water. There's a metaphor in that.

Sermons: a case for the defence

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

U.S. President Barack Obama seems to have more faith in synagogue sermons than most Jews I know. This year, in anticipation of the High Holidays, he once again held a teleconference with some 1,000 American rabbis across the denominational divide asking them to stress themes close to his political agenda such as health care, resumed talks between Israelis and Palestinians, and, of course, Syria.

But he didn't stay for the sermon when he visited the synagogue in Stockholm on Erev Rosh Hashanah on his way to the G20 Summit in St. Petersburg.

Though I've preached countless sermons, a few even in Stockholm, I was never sure that what I had to say mattered to those who heard them. Only a handful of people would react. One of the most common "compliments" would be, "I didn't fall asleep this time," perhaps alluding to the biting definition of a rabbi as "invisible six days of the week and incomprehensible on the seventh."

Having agonized for weeks before the High Holidays about what to say and how to say it in the hope of providing a year's supply of Judaism for those who aren't likely to be in synagogue on other occasions, I didn't particularly like to be told, albeit in jest, that the best I accomplished was keeping people awake. It made me feel like the author of the infamous marginal note in a sermon manuscript: "Shout – argument weak!"

Though I've happily forgotten most of the comments I received over the years, a few have stayed with me. One of the first sermons I ever preached as a rabbinic student was in a congregation in London, England, dominated by one of the scions of Anglo Jewry. For him, form was apparently more important than content. Acknowledging that English wasn't my first language, he complimented me on my address: "No split infinitives, no prepositions at the end."

After preaching in a congregation in South Africa, its rabbi emeritus praised me, tongue-in-cheek I assume, for putting in a good word for God.

In another congregation there, I was approached after the service by a man who said he was one of its founders. Therefore, he felt entitled to tell me that mine was the finest sermon ever preached in that synagogue. He then asked me for a copy of it, because, "I'm very deaf – didn't hear a word."

Yet I refuse to give up on preaching and have always paid great attention to what I wanted to say to the congregation. I tried my best to be topical, relevant and, I hope, articulate. Historically, the Reform synagogue brought back the sermon to Jewish life and used it as a way of educating Jews about their heritage and how it relates to the realities of their lives. I saw myself as one of its exponents.

The sermon in this scheme of things was to be a bridge between the traditional texts and the day-to-day experiences of worshippers. Scholars of 19th-century Wissenschaft (Jewish science) who sought to anchor non-Orthodox Judaism in Jewish sources made a case for the traditional roots of the modern sermon. The emphasis on "the ministry of the word" in the Protestant Church was no doubt also an influence.

In 1989, soon after the appearance of my book of sermons, Walking Toward Elijah, I published an article with the same title as the headline for this column, in which I also cited Franz Rosenzweig, the most influential thinker in modern Judaism. He found his way back to Judaism partly thanks to the sermons by Rabbi Nehemiah Noble of Frankfurt. I argued that even if congregants appear to be less enthusiastic than was Rosenzweig, they may be at least subliminally affected by what rabbis tell them from the pulpit.

It's clear, however, that sermons matter less nowadays, both in the church and in the synagogue, even in Reform congregations. Perhaps not only worshippers but also preachers have given up. Thus in many places, especially in Israel, little is being said from the pulpit beyond the liturgy. Elsewhere, sermons have often become perfunctory addresses peppered with strings of quotations from obscure sources gleaned from Google and similar authorities.

Dare one hope that the 1,000 rabbis who were on that conference call with Obama moved their congregations to pay attention to their sermons by making them sufficiently informative and inspiring beyond the president's narrow agenda?

Promoting freedom all over the planet

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Thousands cheered as astronaut Chris Hadfield launched into his message of freedom of choice at the fourth annual Freedom Day celebrations in Toronto.

Hadfield, who returned home in May after five months as commander of the International Space Station, talked about his experience growing up in Sarnia, Ont., wanting to be an astronaut, even at a time when no Canadians had that job. He said the fact that he was able to accomplish his goal when there was no clear path toward it is proof of the freedom enjoyed by Canadians.

Chris Hadfield and a student choir perform Is Somebody Singing?, the song he co-wrote with Ed Robertson and sang in space. [Cara Stern photo]

"I've had the chance in my life to do so many incredible things," he told The CJN. "It's really imperative to come back and talk to people about it, to share the experience with others, and let people know, especially young people, what opportunities exist."

More than 3,500 students flocked to Toronto's Dundas Square for the Sept. 25 event, with the farthest groups coming from schools in Belleville, Ont. Freedom Day is held annually on or around Sept. 20, the anniversary of Nazi hunter Simon Wiesenthal's death in 2005.

Wiesenthal was a Holocaust survivor who was nominated for a Nobel peace prize in 1985.

This year's event was bigger than ever, said Avi Benlolo, CEO of the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies, which organized the day. He said each year has ended with great reviews from students, who not only get to experience the program on the day itself, but also look at various aspects of freedom with their teachers in advance, using a curriculum supplied by the centre.

Following the event, many of the students write journals and complete projects to gain a deeper understanding of the values and what they can do to stand up for them.

"We must continue to preserve the values of democracy and freedom," Benlolo said, urging students to use the Internet, and social media sites in particular. "You can help change the world."

The presentation was filled with music and dance, as well as both sad and inspirational speeches. Students took turns reading testimony and speeches from famous freedom activists like Martin Luther King Jr. and Malala Yousafzai, the Pakistani teen who was shot in the head by the Taliban last year in an attempt to silence her activism.

Chris Alexander, minister of citizenship and immigration, cut the ribbon with Hadfield to officially open the high-tech Tour for Humanity bus, which has been described as a "mobile tolerance education centre." The bus will visit a number of towns and enable students, educators and law enforcement representatives to learn about topics like genocide, bullying and leadership.

Alexander underlined that freedom is at the core of Canadian values, and explained he was there on behalf of Prime Minister Stephen Harper, who was in New York City on a trip that included a meeting with Yousafzai at the United Nations.

"Freedom is one of the fundamental values that underpins everything we do," Alexander told The CJN. "I believe in the cause of freedom, including remembering the catastrophe of the Holocaust and preventing that scale of disaster anywhere in the world anytime in the future."

Holocaust survivor Max Eisen also addressed the students, sharing his own story of being in Auschwitz. He described the feeling of living without freedom and not knowing if he would ever experience it again.

"There is no freedom without responsibility," he said, leaving the students with that one message. "Let every day be the day you stand up to be a hero."

Nevertheless, Hadfield said in his keynote speech, despite the damage people have done to the world, both to the environment and to its people, when you look at the grand picture – or at the earth itself from the space station – "the beauty of the world outshines the ugliness."

One just has to look up and see the space station pass by to remember some of the good that can come when countries and people from different backgrounds learn about each other – perhaps by learning about each other's languages and beliefs – and work towards something good, he said.

Reena marks 40 years with fundraiser

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Forty years ago, five families who had children with developmental disabilities got together to try to find a place for their kids to live in the Jewish community.

The alternative for families in their situation was often to hand over the children and have them become wards of the state.

That small group – with the crucial guidance of co-founder Rabbi Joseph Kelman, spiritual leader of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, who had previously set up a number of programs for children with developmental disabilities – became Reena, a non-profit social service agency dedicated to integrating individuals with developmental disabilities into the mainstream of society.

The agency now has about 500 clients living in its homes and some 1,200 others involved with the organization, which offers about 15 outreach programs.

Steven Justein, a longtime board member, whose sister, Shari, 53, is a Reena client, said that although his family was not in the initial group, they have been involved with Reena for almost 40 years.

"When Shari was young, my parents constantly worried about what would happen to her. Then they were introduced to Reena, and life changed."

He said his sister lives in her own apartment with some assistance, takes the bus to Baycrest, where she volunteers, and cooks herself meals.

"Most important, however, Reena taught her to have dignity, self-worth and confidence. That's why I volunteer. I can never give back enough for what Reena has done for my sister."

Ann Szabo, Reena's resource manager, for day, outreach respite and residential, said the Reena Foundation's first annual Exceptional Abilities Series, featuring former U.S. presidential adviser David Axelrod, which takes place Oct. 8 at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre, is raising funds for Reena's outreach programs.

A former senior adviser to U.S. President Barack Obama, Axelrod has a child with developmental disabilities who lives in a home similar to a Reena home in Chicago.

"We get no government funding, so we need to raise $400,000 in order to run these programs, which are lifelines for many families," Szabo said.

Reena's dream, she said, is to have a $9-million endowment so the programs – which include an after-school club, a summer and March break camp, a Sunday Friends Club, a swim club, an athletic club, a cooking club and residential and children's respite – are never at risk.

Also in its 40th anniversary year, Reena is set to launch a $2-million campaign to create a Reena Behavioural Home in Richmond Hill behind Mackenzie Regional Hospital. The specially designed home will house people with significant behavioural issues associated with their developmental disability.

Reena Foundation president Gary Sim said the home is a new model for the agency.

Szabo said Reena has purchased the land and is now visiting other agencies before meeting with architects.

"This is a home – both permanent and respite – for people with the most challenging of needs."

It will be built with the necessary safety and damage-resistant materials, and there will be design elements that allow residents to both co-reside and be separated, as their behaviour dictates.

Sim said people with developmental disabilities are living much longer than they did decades ago, and to accommodate these seniors, Reena built one of the first elder homes on the continent for people with developmental disabilities.

"We have also partnered with Baycrest, Cummer Lodge and Maple Health Centre to support seniors in long-term care," he added. "It breaks my heart when I think about what these seniors, [who didn't have Reena's services when they were young] missed along the way."

Canadian Centre for Diversity to close doors

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

After 63 years as a going concern, the Canadian Centre for Diversity (CCD) is ceasing day to day operations.

The organization, which began life as the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews (CCCJ), will wind up operations in the next 60 to 90 days, lay off 10 employees and seek out other charitable organizations to take on its primary leadership education function, said Janice O'Born, chair of the board of directors.

Four hundred Toronto students who have signed up for the organization's leadership training program will be told the program has been cancelled, she added.

O'Born said the steps had to be taken now so that there would be enough funds on hand to ensure current staff receive a full severance package. The reason for the closure is purely financial, she said. In recent years, private sector donations have dried up and government grants have not been forthcoming. The organization faces a $1-million shortfall in its 2013 budget.

O'Born attributed much of the problem to "donor fatigue," as more and more high-profile charitable projects draw away available community resources. She also said previous management mishandled the change that led to the end of the CCCJ and the creation of the Canadian Centre for Diversity.

Long-standing supporters were not consulted about the change, she said. Many were angry at being handed a fait accompli and decided not to support the new organization.

The change, however, was necessary, she said. "The school system did not allow us in as Christians and Jews. They said we were not being inclusive."

The name change was not accompanied by a proper media and marketing campaign, she added.

Victor Goldbloom, who headed the CCCJ from 1979 to 1987, said he was saddened by the organization's demise. Prior to World War II, "Canada was a country where anti-Semitism was widespread. There was no formal dialogue. There was all kinds of exclusion from clubs and the boards of major corporations."

Following the Shoah, "there was a need for dialogue... to reflect on the Shoah and the kind of society Canada was before the war," he said.

Even during his tenure as CEO of the CCCJ, there was a perception in some circles that the need for the organization was lessening. Jews were no longer being excluded from larger companies and corporate funding began to decrease, he said.

The CCD's decision to cease operations "is the culmination of that evolution, where people really came together to make Canada a much more equitable and open society."

Though the CCCJ earlier ended as an organization, interfaith dialogue continued in other forums: there are Christian-Jewish dialogue groups in Toronto and Montreal, while the Canadian Interfaith Conversation attracts other faith groups, he said.

For her part, O'Born believes there is a still a crying need for the CCD to foster inclusiveness and oppose discrimination. She's hoping another charity will take on its programming. "I really don't see a difference... I feel we really haven't come very far," she said.

Nosanchuk helped expand U.S. hate crimes law

Windsor man is new White House Jewish liaison

Ron Stang
Special to The CJN

WINDSOR, Ont. — Windsor-born Matt Nosanchuk is the new Jewish liaison for the Obama Administration in Washington D.C.

Working out of the White House, Nosanchuk is the point man for communications between America's myriad Jewish organizations and the federal government. He was appointed in July.

Nosanchuk is the son of retired Windsor Provincial Court Judge Saul Nosanchuk. When his parents divorced, he moved to Detroit, where he attended elementary and high schools, then obtained his undergraduate and law degrees at Stanford University.

Nosanchuk, 48, has a strong civil rights background, a prime reason he was chosen for the post.

He held a senior position in the U.S. Department of Justice prior to the appointment. His portfolio consisted of working on the administration's response to the Defence of Marriage Act, which successfully voided the act resulting in benefits being extended to same-sex couples.

He also was pivotal in expanding hate crime law under the Matthew Shepard Act of 2009 to include crimes related to gender and disability.

Nosanchuk attributed his interest in civil rights partly to his own background as well as his Jewish heritage.

"I think I identified with the outsider," he said.

He grew up in downtown Detroit in an integrated neighbourhood, but attended a private school in elite Grosse Pointe, where "I was Jewish and everybody else in my school wasn't." He also was a "child of divorced parents at a time when that wasn't very prevalent."

He said the "values of his parents" also played a role.

His father, Saul, is well known in Windsor for his humane treatment of offenders. A young offender rehabilitation and halfway house is named after him.

The values "imparted to me as a Jew" also determined Nosanchuk's desire to practice human rights law and "help others to ensure that injustices were addressed and rectified."

Accepting the White House appointment now means Nosanchuk can work directly for President Barack Obama, of whom he's long been a "strong supporter" and can "contribute to the success of his presidency in whatever way I can."

Said his father Saul: "I think he's had a remarkable career. I'm very proud and moved that he would be interested in public service. That has been his focus throughout his whole career."

Nosanchuk is still getting acquainted with the new role, but already has met with numerous Jewish organizations on a range of issues, including Syria, the restarted Middle East peace process, the Affordable Health Care act and comprehensive immigration reform.

"In issue after issue, things that are of significance to the administration also are a priority to the Jewish community," he said.

Nosanchuk said he's both a sounding board for various Jewish interests, as well as someone through whom to communicate White House policy.

He recently organized a Washington briefing for 70 Jewish federation leaders. He's also attended high-level meetings between Jewish leaders and top administration officials, such as National Security Adviser Susan Rice and Secretary of State John Kerry.

He said Middle East issues are obvious priorities, but so is a matter like immigration reform, which seemingly might not affect Jews.

But, he said, this is relevant to Jews' "historic experience." He said the Jewish community wants to ensure "that we don't pull up the ladder behind us" and deny opportunity to new immigrants.

"And so it very much ties into our own experience in this country and to our values as Jews in helping others," he said.

He said U.S. and Canadian Jews "have close ties and shared values and priorities."

He said many American Jews, "like me, have Canadian relatives, or were born in Canada."

As well, a number of Jewish organizations and religious denominations have an "institutional presence in both countries... in fact, I [recently] spoke at a salon here organized by two Washingtonians, both of whom grew up in Montreal."

Organ donation project to be a focus of meeting

NCJWC to hold triennial convention in Winnipeg

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For the first time in more than 10 years, the Winnipeg branch of the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada (NCJWC) is hosting the organization's triennial convention.

"It will primarily consist of business meetings," said Sharon Allentuck, NCJWC vice-president and co-chair of the convention (along with immediate past president Dianne Glass), which takes place Oct. 4 to 6 at the Hotel Fort Garry. Both Glass and Allentuck are from Winnipeg.

One of the focuses of the convention will be on a new project that the Toronto section has introduced to promote organ donation. Toronto representatives will be filling in their sisters from the other Canadian sections on the new Gift of Life (organ and tissue transplant) program.

Organ donation within the context of Halachah will also be the subject of Rabbi Alan Green's presentation at the convention Shabbat supper. Rabbi Green is the longtime spiritual leader of Congregation Shaarey Zedek, Winnipeg's largest synagogue.

Another order of business will be the installation of two new national vice-presidents, Paula Frisch from Toronto and Ronee Alter from London, Ont. The current president is Marni Besser from Calgary, who assumed the presidency two years ago and has agreed to serve for three more years.

Allentuck said membership stands at about 3,000 nationally, with about 250 in Winnipeg.

"We will also be looking at ways to recruit younger members," she said. "We will be redoing our webpage and logo and we're considering opening a Facebook page."

She notes that in Winnipeg, a couple of Argentine immigrants have recently joined NCJWC and are trying to restart a second chapter here.

Allentuck said that on the Saturday afternoon, the convention attendees will be given a guided tour of the Canadian Museum for Human Rights, which will not be open to the public for another year and is located just a couple of blocks from the Fort Garry Hotel.

She noted that 35 national members are expected to attend the convention.

Martin has always been a supporter of Israel education and research and development" while at the same time cutting taxes and taming the deficit, said Shapira.

Pointing to the Kelowna Accord, negotiated by Martin's government to aid aboriginal groups, Shapira said the scholarship in his name "is meant to help bright underprivileged students."

Many students hail from Israel's "periphery. As in many other countries, periphery goes together with poverty, or less opportunities. This is true in Israel for the different parts of the population: Jews, Arab, Druze," Shapira stated.

The university plays a key role in strengthening Israel's north through education, research and by developing future community leaders, Shapira added.

Martin said the school shares the same values as Canada, including respect for diversity.

He has always been a supporter of Israel, the former prime minister continued. Martin recalled that his father served as foreign minister and "at the dinner table, it was clear that support for Israel was a foundation of our policy."

The Liberal Party, he said, has "always supported Israel from the very beginning."

Reflecting on his time as prime minister, Martin said he modified Canadian policy at the United Nations to be more favourable to Israel. Prior to his administration, Canada often supported resolutions critical of the Jewish state. "I stepped in and stopped that support," he said.

"I think our support for Israel comes from the fact [we] share a common set of values," he added.

Martin said he supported the legitimacy of the Jewish state of Israel and "I spoke for recognition for Jewish refugees from Arab lands. I felt very strongly about that."

As to the current situation in the region, Martin believes "a nuclear-armed Iran would be a major threat. In my opinion, that is one of the greatest threats to peace."

Martin invoked the "responsibility to protect" doctrine regarding Syria, and he credited one of its major proponents, former justice minister Irwin Cotler, as an influence on him.

"There are those who do not believe that it's the occasion for the responsibility to protect. I am not one of those."

"Responsibility to protect was put in place to recognize that a country must protect its citizens and [has the] duty not to oppress its citizens." If it does, it's the responsibility of other governments to step in.

"If using weapons of mass destruction is not oppression, then I don't know what is. It shows you what we're dealing with, with the Assad regime."

"What kind of signal does it send to Iran and North Korea if red lines are drawn in the sand and if NATO, the United States and others of us are not willing to stand behind what we've said about those red lines?" he asked.

Soccer match unites Jews, Sikhs

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL— A Hampstead synagogue and members of the Sikh community are showing goodwill in the midst of the acrimonious debate over values in Quebec by teaming up for a series of joint activities.

Congregation Dorshei Emet, better known as the Reconstructionist Synagogue, and Sikh community leaders Manjit Singh and Harjeet Singh Bhabra got things going with a friendly soccer match on Sept. 29 between young people from each community, held at Mackenzie King Park.

Most of the Sikh participants are from the Gurdwara Sahib Greater Montreal Temple in Dollard des Ormeaux.

Young men and women aged 16 to 22 took part in the program, dubbed the "Turbans vs. Kippot Face-off."

The two communities have found common ground as two "Peoples of the Book," whose traditional headgear as religious minorities is the target of the proposed Quebec charter of values.

The choice of soccer as the inaugural event is a reminder that this past spring, the Quebec Soccer Federation sought to ban the wearing of the Sikh turban on the pitch, which provoked a widespread outcry. The federation reversed the directive after FIFA, the international soccer body, confirmed that turbans were permitted.

Dorshei Emet executive director Robyn Bennett said, "Rather than following an increasingly worrisome trend of polarization and fear of the other, members of the two communities have chosen to get to know each other, their similarities and their differences."

Anne Frank's stepsister to speak in Toronto

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — In 1947, when Otto Frank carefully unwrapped the small package in his hands and showed Eva Schloss his late daughter's diary, she had no inkling she was taking the world's first glimpse at what would become one of the greatest publishing sagas in history.

The Diary of Anne Frank, first published later the same year in Dutch, has sold millions of copies and been translated into 70 languages, its poignant memoir of a Jewish family in hiding during the Holocaust and of Anne's adolescent yearning resonating universally.

"Of course, I had no idea," Schloss, 84, said in a telephone interview from London, England. "Nobody thought it would become such a success."

Six years later, Otto Frank, his entire family wiped out by the Nazis, married Schloss's mother, Elfriede Geiringer, whose husband and son had also perished in the Holocaust. In so doing, Frank became Schloss's stepfather, and Schloss became Anne Frank's stepsister posthumously.

It's a story Schloss will tell and elaborate on in Montreal at the annual Chaya Mushka Chabad Seminary Gala, Oct. 10, 7 p.m. at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, as well as in Toronto and Guelph, Ont.

It will also be the first visit to Canada by Schloss, who has spent years recounting her life story and conveying a message of tolerance and humanity.

She and Anne Frank were born only one month apart and played together after school as childhood friends in Amsterdam between the ages of nine and 11. Their respective families also hid separately during the same period before each was discovered by the Nazis.

Eva Schloss

Schloss remembered Anne as precocious and, in a way, a more worldly girl than she was.

"She had two personalities really," said Schloss, who became a professional photographer in England after she married her husband, Zvi, in 1952 and moved there.

"The first was the one she showed to the outside world, a little lady thinking about her hair style and boys."

But inside, "she wanted to be a better person. She was more insecure than she let out to be."

Schloss described her late stepfather, Otto, as a sweet and loving man whose discovery of the diary allowed him to emerge from the Holocaust and find a new purpose in life.

"He was so proud of it," Schloss said.

Despite Anne Frank and Schloss knowing each other mostly as playmates, Schloss never would have predicted that Otto Frank would one day marry her mother.

He met Elfriede Geiringer for the first time when the survivors of both families returned to Amsterdam after the war and Otto showed up with the diary.

"I remember it very clearly," Schloss said in a second interview. "It was for him, really, a lifeline to life again, because before that, he was in a desperate state, [but it would now] be his task to publish it and promote her story."

Otto helped Schloss and her mother, gradually became close to her, and eventually married her in 1953, a year after Schloss herself was wed.

In 1988, Schloss published a book about her own life – Eva's Story – and in 1995, she co-operated in the creation of playwright James Still's educational play, And Then They Came for Me: Remembering the World of Anne Frank.

Schloss is also a co-founder of the Anne Frank Trust UK, whose mission is to "challenge prejudice and reduce hate by drawing on the power of Anne Frank's life and diary."

Schloss is the guest speaker in Toronto on Oct. 7 at the Uptown Chabad Gala at the Ontario Science Centre in an evening honouring Alan and Sheila Mostyn. Israeli musician Gad Elbaz and Cantor Aaron Bensoussan also perform. For tickets, call 416-635-9696 or visit www.ChabadGala.ca.

She will also speak Oct. 6 at 7 p.m. in Guelph, Ont., at Beth Isaiah Synagogue, 47 Surrey St. W.

Art meets Baycrest-powered science in My Virtual Dream

By Garry Foster, Interim President, Baycrest Foundation & Dr. William E. Reichman, Baycrest President and Chief Executive Officer

Baycrest Health Sciences is unique across the globe for the way it combines clinical care, research on brain health and aging, education and arts and culture into a holistic model of care for older adults. Nowhere else does medicine, science and art intersect in a way that is helping transform the way people think about—and experience—the process of aging.

Those who have visited our Bathurst Street campus know the importance of art and culture for our clients. Our hallways look more like an art gallery than a conventional healthcare facility, replete with original paintings and sculptures donated to Baycrest over the years. For our residents, art is used as therapy, as recreation, as a means of navigation, and to celebrate the rich cultural heritage that has shaped our organization and our community over the years.

On October 5, Baycrest will be hosting My Virtual Dream, a spectacular multimedia event that brings together innovative technology with a stunning visual and musical backdrop generated through the brain waves of participants at Toronto's Scotiabank Nuit Blanche.

Scotiabank Nuit Blanche is a free all-night contemporary art event that features interactive installations throughout the city. This year, Baycrest has partnered with the University of Toronto to erect a 60-foot dome at the corner of College Street and University Avenue that will provide a truly unique venue for My Virtual Dream.

Special Brain-Computer Interface (BCI) headsets will read participants' brain activity and relay it to the Virtual Brain—a cutting-edge piece of software that provides a computerized replica of the human brain. The Virtual Brain will interpret and translate the brain activity into stunning animations and sounds that will be projected onto the dome in real time.

Spectators will be able to witness the incredible dream sequences from 6:52 p.m. on October 5 until 6:52 a.m. on October 6.

While anyone who visits My Virtual Dream during Scotiabank Nuit Blanche will be treated to a spectacular experience , the installation will also have a long-lasting impact by advancing neuroscience research. Every 30 minutes, a new group of participants will use the BCI headsets to play a video game that doubles as a science experiment. Since winning the game depends on the group of dreamers coordinating their brain waves, the game studies how people can connect using only shared audio and visual cues. After Scotiabank Nuit Blanche, results from the game could lay the groundwork for future research and therapeutic applications to enable people to communicate in the absence of language.

Imagine someone who has suffered a stroke and has no way to speak or effectively use a computer being able to communicate with just their brain waves—the implications for providing better patient-centred care are enormous, and are exactly the sort of thing our scientists at Baycrest are working to make a reality every day.

We hope you will take the time to visit My Virtual Dream at this year's Scotiabank Nuit Blanche. More information about the event, our installation and Baycrest's Virtual Brain is available at www.myvirtualdream.ca.

Cantor 'was an iconic figure in the community'

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Joseph Freiman, cantor at Congregation Or Shalom in London, Ont., for almost 40 years, died recently at age 94.

A native of Romania, he came to London in 1968 from Uruguay, where he fled after World War II. During the war, he had been interned in a number of concentration camps, including Auschwitz.

William Klein, a London dentist and a past president of the congregation, said that although Freiman, known to everyone as Yossi, was unable to attend services for about six years, "he was an iconic figure in the community and enjoyed a well-deserved reputation for his exceptional skills in music, chazzanut, teaching b'nai/b'not mitzvah students, and in interacting with people of all ages."

Freiman was also a leather goods designer and manufacturer, Klein said.

"He learned the trade in Romania while he was studying at the yeshiva. It was impressed upon him at an early age that it is imperative to be self-sufficient, and he and his wife, Eva, to whom he was married 60 years, operated a leather goods store for many years. The wallets he made never wore out, they were so well made."

Klein said Freiman taught his approximately 600 bar/bar mitzvah students "much more than a Maftir and a Haftorah. He was a role model who lived the life of a sincere, pious Jew. He walked the walk and talked the talk. He was always haunted by the Holocaust, and he attributed his survival to his deep faith in God."

Freiman led all the synagogue services on Shabbat and holidays, and also read the Torah, Klein said. "He filled the role that usually takes at least two people in larger centres such as Toronto or Montreal."

He and his wife were the 1997 honorees at Jewish National Fund's annual Negev dinner in London.

"At age 79, he only began to slow down a bit, and shared the leadership role with several congregants," Klein said.

He said that throughout Freiman's four decades at Or Shalom, "he was a people-person, always seeking out new faces and acknowledging familiar ones.

"He had a knack for connecting with people. No one who met him ever walked away untouched. He was well-known for his sincerity and generosity. He was very well versed in Torah, Talmud, etc. and constantly peppered his conversations with relevant quotations.

"[He and his wife] hosted regular gatherings of congregants after Shabbat. In this way, they were pivotal in the pastoral work that helped build the congregation and solidify its membership."

Klein said that although Freiman was a resident in a nursing home for the last number of months, "and his memory was ravaged, he was able to sing Kol Nidre during a visit by congregants just weeks before he passed away. [He sang it from memory] in a voice that was still clear and resonant."

A funeral service for Freiman was held Sept. 9 at the synagogue. He is survived by his wife Eva, children Liliane (Emil) Freiman-Cohen and Gabriel (Yetta); grandchildren Rebecca and Noah Freiman; his brother Emil (Magda) Freiman of Toronto, and his sister Clari Bohm of Argentina; his sister-in-law Carla Taub of London, as well as many nieces and nephews.

Women's Brain Health Initiative raises over $200,000

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Huffington Post founder Arianna Huffington and Indigo Books & Music CEO Heather Reisman became the first two women to receive the limited edition Hope-Knot icon of the Women's Brain Health Initiative (WBHI).

The award was presented to them Sept. 10 at Reisman's home by WBHI chair and head of Twitter Canada, Kirstine Stewart, at an exclusive fundraising event that raised more than $200,000 for research into women's brain ailments, bringing the WBHI's fundraising total so far to more than $700,000 since its founding in 2012.

The unique piece was designed by renowned Canadian jeweller Mark Lash.

"The Hope-Knot symbolizes both the human brain and the invaluable intelligence and insight women provide every single day, whether it is to family, business, academia, the arts, or to society in general," said Stewart.

"Arianna and Heather are true champions of our effort to ensure that the looming crisis in women's brain health becomes a top research priority here in Canada and around the world. We are thrilled to induct them as the first two members of the Hope-Knot 100 Club of the world's most influential women who have risen to the top of their fields thanks to their own wonderful brains – which represent exactly what the WBHI is determined to protect," said WBHI founder and president Lynn Posluns.

The WBHI is a Canadian charity that helps fight women's brain aging disorders through investment in focused, innovative research at leading institutions around the world.

"It was frightening to learn that 70 per cent of all new Alzheimer sufferers will be women, and that women suffer from stroke, depression and dementia twice as much as men, and that a women's healthy life expectancy is 25 per cent worse than a man's," Posluns said.

"Research today still focuses on men. In fact, at the grassroots level of research, it's the male rat that is studied because the hormones in the female make it too complex."

Some 85 guests attended the Sept. 10 fundraiser, and all received a sterling silver Hope-Knot pin.

Pauline Maki, a professor of psychiatry and psychology, and director of women's mental heath research at the University of Illinois, told The CJN that "there are fundamental differences in the way that women's brains age compared to the ways men's brains age. It starts early in life. It starts with differences that women and men have in terms of their memory abilities. That, in part, is due to the fact that women have more estrogen than men do.

"In terms of predicting who will develop dementia we have come a long way and probably the fundamental shift in our understanding is what we can do to help ourselves. Keeping your heart health very strong is the best thing we can do at mid-life" she added.

"Keeping our brains active in novel ways such as learning a new language or a new skill. You need to exercise as well as keep your stress levels low. All of these things are associated with a lower risk of Alzheimer's disease later in life."

Holocaust poster contest focuses on remembrance

CJN Staff

The winner of a Holocaust remembrance poster contest said she feels honoured that her work can speak powerfully to members of a generation used to receiving news visually, helping them remember a difficult past.

"It's really important that we talk about our shared history, even the parts that are really difficult," said Caitlin McGinn, a student at Emily Carr University of Art and Design in Vancouver. "It's the only way to ensure that history doesn't repeat itself."

McGinn was the first-place winner of the international competition, which was a joint effort between Yad Vashem and the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance, which is currently being chaired by Canadian officials, led by former Davenport Liberal MP Mario Silva, until next March.

The theme was "Keeping the Memory Alive – Journeys through the Holocaust."

McGinn created a poster that featured concentration camp documents superimposed to give glimpses into the lives of those who can't share their own stories.

Like McGinn, the runner-up was a Canadian student at Emily Carr. Carling Hind's poster had at the top, "I should like someone to remember there once lived a person named," and then the poster displays the names of a number of people murdered in the Holocaust.

Hind said her inspiration came from the art of names and the unique history they hold.

In total, about 500 students entered the contest. Posters from seven Canadian students made the final round.

The top 16, which included two more Canadians – Derek Michael Wasylyshen from the University of Manitoba, and Joakim Sundal, from Emily Carr – will be displayed in prominent locations around the world starting Jan. 27, coinciding with International Holocaust Remembrance Day.

Some of the locations include the United Nations headquarters in New York, as well as UN offices in Geneva and Vienna, and the European Commission in Brussels.

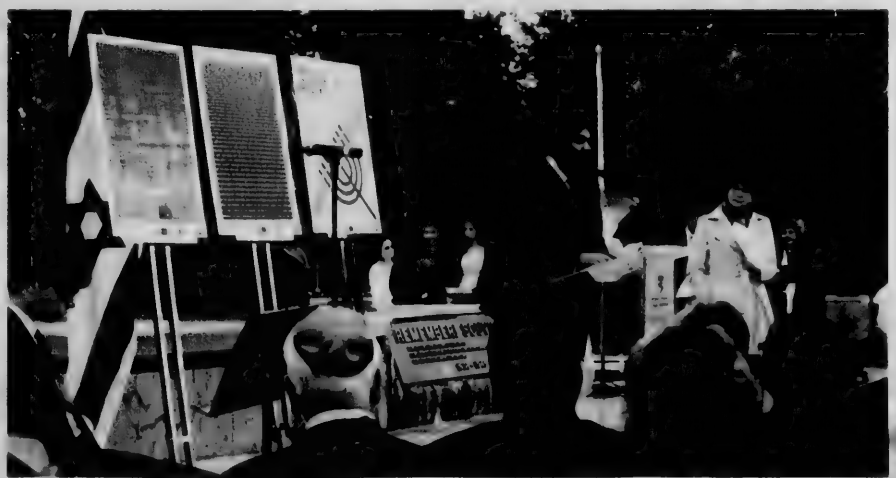
"Our government is committed to Holocaust education and remembrance as well as to ensuring that Canadians, especially youth and future generations, examine actions of the past to help inform their decisions in the future," said Tim Uppal, federal minister of state (multiculturalism), who announced the winner on behalf of Jason Kenney, minister for multiculturalism.

"Canadians can take pride in the achievements of these young and talented students and of our country's strong showing in this important international competition."

Uppal made the announcement at the annual Holocaust commemorative ceremony at Earl Bales Park in Toronto on Sept. 22.



At the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem's Yizkor Ceremony on Sept. 22, at Earl Bales Park, federal minister Tim Uppal, gives an address to the crowd of about 350 dignitaries, Holocaust survivors, and members of the community as Fran Sonshine, national chair of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, looks on.

Justice should be our passion, empathy our instrument

"Man is like a breath, his days are like a passing shadow"

These saintly words are taken from the prayer for loved ones during the Jewish memorial service called Yizkor. When a spouse comes to me in pain I often think about these words. Spouses in high conflict cases when fighting each other lose their perspective and often forget where we are all headed anyway. But how are painful "high conflict" disputes viewed by the opinion makers, the columnists, the editorialists or just "Joe Public?" Just how healthy is our collective perspective? Take the following true facts in contrasting scenarios, repeated mercilessly across this blessed land.

In an Ontario Court of Appeal decision titled C.S. v. M.S., a 2007 decision made by the Superior Court to grant the mother custody of the couple's youngest child was upheld. The original decision also awarded the mother costs of over $320,000, a restraining order against the father for both the mother and child, as well as barring the other three children from their marriage from having access to the youngest child. These decisions were also upheld.

According to the Ontario Court of Appeal decision, there was substantial evidence that the three other children (who are now adults) were alienated from their mother and the youngest child had not yet been alienated but would eventually become a victim of Parental Alienation Syndrome ("PAS").

The ravages of Parental Alienation Syndrome

PAS is essentially the "brainwashing" of a child against one parent by the other parent, and can have long-term detrimental effects on the well-being of the child and his or her relationships with the parents.

The court found that "the father has taken aggressive and persistent steps to alienate his other children from their mother. The likelihood of this continuing with [the youngest child] if the father had access to her was virtually certain". (I thank Mr. Julius Ormware, an Ontario lawyer, for this summary at http://bit.ly/18mnySb).

I have seen cases of emotionally and physically abused mothers, where children are alienated, mothers are attacked in silence, large sums of support arrears ignored by the Ontario support enforcement agency and children kidnapped to foreign jurisdictions. I have witnessed countless mothers face financial ruin after running out of money to pay their lawyers, or often having to beg the Crown to withdraw assault charges against their violent husbands just to survive. I have seen parents sell or mortgage their homes just to pay their daughter's legal fees. I have seen women unable to pay for experts or lawyers to prove how much their self-employed husbands truly earn, and the children of these women suffer. I have seen mothers who earn too much for Legal Aid but not enough to hire a qualified family law lawyer. I have witnessed such pain not only in my own practice but in the thousands of cases my students and I have summarized over the past two decades in my Syrtash Family Law Netletter. (The SFLN is an online weekly digest of family case law for the legal profession published by LexisNexis.)

And what of that other pain? This is the pain of "George", or the many other "Georges" I have represented or have reviewed in my family law digest. Many men deserve to be charged with criminal assault and deserve to be punished or exposed for this crime once convicted. It's not only the physical pain that hurts: it's the fundamental betrayal of trust that intimacy expects. Just imagine: that tender man becomes your predator. And you have to hide the violence from your children, if you can. And if your children witness it their scars may never heal.

But then there are the other Georges, the innocent men with partners who have the police lay a completely fictitious criminal charge of assault and/or sexual assault for purely strategic or tactical reasons. The police then arrest such men under Ontario's "zero" tolerance policy concerning family violence. A bail ("recognizance") order automatically excludes them from their home and their children. Some lose their job or career over the publicity surrounding the arrest. They are then deemed to be guilty by society and the family court until proven innocent. Most cannot afford a highly qualified criminal lawyer so they pay what they can. Some of these lawyers would rather negotiate a "Peace Bond" than go to trial to prove their client's innocence since it's so much easier and less costly for everyone than a lengthy full-blown trial, often broken up over several months rather than completed over a few days. Conversely, other innocent men are advised to go to trial but would rather sign a Peace Bond which implies their guilt because they simply can't afford a trial, no matter how innocent they may be.

Even when "George" wins, he loses

Criminal lawyers who ply their trade will often get an acquittal through preparation and thorough cross-examination for the clients who are patient and can afford a trial. However, by the time George gets his acquittal, the "status quo" has given the mother the "edge" in the family court because it has usually taken six months to a year or more for the accused to prove his innocence. And after a year of living under a cloud of suspicion, his contacts, his boss, and society have long forgotten that he might have been innocent. After such a lengthy time, George has long since been deemed to be a violent abuser and/or rapist no matter what the Court rules.

Meanwhile, the family court will have great sympathy for him after an acquittal, but its only duty pertains to the children's "best interests." Even if their mother committed perjury, it may not matter if she has had the "status quo" or "de facto" custody for the year or more until George's innocence was proven. Indeed, the children may no longer wish to move. They may well have become used to living with Mom. They may well have been convinced subsequent to the arrest that their Dad is a horrible person who doesn't love them. False allegations have made access in many cases very problematic where perceptions, no matter how wrong, become reality. I have seen countless birthday and Christmas/Chanukah gifts returned, unopened.

Whose side are you on — men, women, or humanity?

So where should this leave the public, on the side of women or on the side of men?

Do I really have to ask how absurd this question is?

Surely, the opinion makers would not take sides and everyone would realize that this problem is not about choosing between Venus or Mars, or whether one sex is more predatory or conflicted than the other? Yet we have certain theorists, lawyers and columnists who champion "men's rights" in family and criminal law, such as Barbara Kay in the National Post. Kay advocates against a gender-biased family law system in Canada that disproportionately punishes men, particularly in spousal support and custody battles. For example, in her April 2013 article she complains of how fathers often "find the deck stacked against them in court" and how the law should presume equal parenting for children when parties separate.

Conversely, we have feminists who write exclusively about how men abuse and dominate women and how our system and even our language must be changed because the Justice system intrinsically reflects male domination, as suggested by authors such as Professor Martha Fineman and Catherine A. MacKinnon.

These authors are not "wrong" because they make useful points about the legal system, many of which have led to important changes in family law, such as recognizing the status of the homemaker and, in the recent past, fostering a more sensitive attitude among many Judges towards father's rights.

However, the tension between opposing camps in respect of family law can lead to an overall impression that the victim is gender-based. Well, surprise: women sometimes physically/financially abuse men and alienate their children from their male partners and other times it's the men.

So, my fair reader, are we really going to quantify how many times and how many members of each sex hurt the other more? The grave takes us all and makes us frighteningly equal. Yet certain professionals actually advertise themselves as "men's rights" oriented while others specialize in women's abuse, to the exclusion of men, whether it's in the field of law or counselling.

Justice should be our passion and empathy should be our instrument.

Choosing the gender of the victim or taking gender sides is a phony ideological battle and a zero sum game.

In custody and support litigation, many men's rights advocates feel that the Justice system is firmly weighted against them with a deep-seated prejudice against their sex, especially when it comes to parenting and support rulings. By contrast, many women feel that their spouse has a superior financial advantage to fight the court battles, particularly when attempting to collect arrears on support through Ontario's Family Responsibility Office or when attempting to calculate their husband's income from self-employment without the benefit of experts these women simply can't afford.

Justice served only by gender-blind solutions

There may be many creative solutions to solving high conflict cases, as tried in other jurisdictions. One possible solution may be providing taxpayer money to need-based middle class spouses, not just to poorer Legal Aid candidates. Mandatory mediation for those not intimidated by the other party's presence may be another. However, for this to work the State must make available and appoint trained professional therapists to deal with difficult parenting issues and neutral experienced Court-appointed forensic accountants/business valuators paid to evaluate incomes and assets in order to help facilitate settlement.

Building up walls between us and soliciting for gender wars is definitely not a solution.

On Yom Kippur there is another prayer. It invokes the need for repentance in the coming year to nullify God's pre-determined decree as to who will live and who will die. But the same prayer offers repentance to counter the predetermined decree as to "who will be harried" and "who will live in tranquility."

May such creative solutions be found to help all victims of abuse and to give them such tranquility, and may these solutions be gender-blind.

'I saw men on stretchers with their guts falling out'

"We were shocked that [Egyptian forces] were already on the other side of the canal in just a few hours and that no one stopped them," said Mira, who was 19 when the war broke out, and just days away from finishing her compulsory service.

Before the war, Mira was stationed in Baluza, the main Israeli base in northwest Sinai, about a half-hour drive from Bar-Lev and the Suez Canal.

Her job was to provide entertainment and recreation for soldiers stationed in the bunkers built along Bar-Lev.

About three months before the end of her service, Mira had made arrangements to serve at the Soroka Medical Center in Be'er Sheva, where she held an administrative position admitting injured soldiers, keeping track of their treatment and keeping them comfortable.

"When the war broke out, I was supposed to go home for Yom Kippur. I was packed and everything," she said, switching from Hebrew to English.

"Before we got the news that the war broke, we got all the injured soldiers from Sinai. It was so chaotic and no one knew anything," she said adding that she and her colleagues worked for about 48 hours straight, taking hour-long catnaps as the injured soldiers continued to pour into the hospital.

About 600 Israeli soldiers were killed and hundreds more were wounded during the first 30 hours of the war – the heaviest casualties ever suffered by Israel in such a short time frame.

"I saw men on the stretchers with their guts falling out," she said, bursting into tears, covering her mouth with a quivering hand.

"It was terrible. They came without names, without anything," she said, speaking through her tears. "Without arms, without legs. I fainted one time... And then I had to let the parents know."

One of the most difficult tasks Mira faced was trying to find out the identity of a soldier who was declared dead upon arrival.

"We didn't know his name. He came naked. No papers, no clothing," she said, explaining that the medics had ripped off his clothes to try to revive him, even stripping him of his dog tags, which are used to identify soldiers.

Knowing that he was hit in the Sinai near Baluza, where she had served for a year and a half, she called the intelligence officers at the base, pleading for information that might help her identify him.

Tears forming anew, lifting her hands to her head, she recalled the urgency in the officer's voice.

"He said, 'What do you want from my life? Everyone is being killed! I can't talk to you! They're burying us!' And most of those people died. I was there for a year and a half, and I knew those people."

Hanan Shefa still struggles with some of the decisions Israeli leaders made during the war, which cost nearly 2,700 Israeli lives.

Surprised at herself for breaking down emotionally during the interview, Mira recalled how strong she was, still just a teenager, in performing her grim tasks.

"I remember one father, when I was talking to him about his son, I was explaining that I had to discharge him and he didn't like that. He slapped me in the face. People didn't know how to react. It was so hard," she said.

"But I was automatic. Like a robot."

While Mira continued to struggle with the hundreds of dead and wounded soldiers that flooded the hospital, 21-year-old Hanan was working as a flight technician on French Super Perlon helicopters in the 114th Squadron based at the Tel Nof airbase.

In addition to maintaining helicopters, Hanan also accompanied the pilots to solve any mechanical problems during flights.

Although the war broke out on Oct. 6, Hanan, who had gone home to Kibbutz Mishmar Hanegev on Erev Yom Kippur, began to suspect that something serious was unfolding the evening before.

"We knew something was going on because some of my friends on the kibbutz – one was in one of the elite units – were already being called in.

"The next day, our air force sent airplanes to do air manoeuvres. That was a sign for us to go back to our bases."

By the time Hanan made it back to his airbase, he saw Phantom fighter jets sitting on the tarmac.

"We heard our troops asking for support, and they wouldn't let us take off," he said.

He doesn't know why they were grounded, but according to the Jewish Virtual Library, the Israeli Air Force failed to destroy the Arabs' anti-aircraft systems in the early hours of the war, which prevented Israel from providing aerial support to its ground forces.

"I remember that we were so upset and we were asking our commanders what the hell was going on. They said, 'Don't ask questions now. Now, you do what we tell you.' I felt for years that some soldiers were sacrificed, and that hurt me so much," he said, gripping his chest.

It wasn't until the following day that Hanan was sent on his first mission.

He and his crew were sent on a 24-hour mission – landing only to refuel – to fly with radar-disrupting electronics to allow fighter jets to fly out.

"During the flight, there were bombs exploding all around us. I was a new flight technician and I didn't have this experience at all. I asked them to close the curtains over the windows so I wouldn't see the bombs because I felt nauseated. I was afraid," he recalled.

"I flew with some guys who were in the 1967 war and they said, 'Don't worry, you'll get used to it.' But I didn't."

Hanan was also sent on rescue missions to pick up pilots who had ejected from their planes.

He recalled one rescue in particular, during which his instincts and adrenaline took over.

"To cover him, I was shooting in an area where I thought there might be enemy soldiers. But he was injured, and he couldn't run to the helicopter, so I jumped down and ran to him and dragged him on. Our medic grabbed the gun from me when I jumped down, to cover me. It wasn't my job to do this. Actually, I disobeyed orders, but my instincts took over and instead of the medic jumping out, I did."

Both Mira and Hanan agreed that despite the heavy casualties suffered in the first two days of the war, there was never a doubt that Israel would come out victorious.

"When you're young, you feel invincible. We didn't even think of it as a possibility. That's why soldiers are 18 years old. They think nothing can happen to them," Hanan said.

But looking back, they both still have so many questions and so much anger.

"I can't explain why they left so few soldiers on the Bar-Lev line" Hanan said. "We were caught with our pants down."

In Meir's recently released testimony, she conceded that "it's possible, maybe even certain," that if they had mounted a pre-emptive strike, "boys who are no longer would still be alive."

Mira believes it was an intelligence failure that cost the young country so many soldiers.

"Israel should have known that her neighbours were going to attack," she said, her voice rising in anger.

"But they didn't believe that it was going to happen."

Group's inaugural conference Oct. 6 at U of T

JSpace aims to give home to left-wing Zionists

Ron Csillag
Special to The CJN

JSpace Canada came along at a particularly interesting – one might even say polarized – time in Canadian Jewish history.

Many Jews in this country have been smitten with Conservative Prime Minister Stephen Harper's vocal, unmistakable and refreshing support for Israel. They believe that on his watch, Canada has shifted from colourless "honest broker" to becoming Israel's best friend on the international stage.

At the same time, labour unions, academics, churches, peace activists and others on the traditional left have been tarring Israel as never before, accusing the Jewish state of apartheid-era practices, and urging, with some success, participation in boycotts of and sanctions against Israel. The language has often veered toward the anti-Semitic.

They were joined by organizations and individuals that identified themselves as Jewish, but were dismissed by the community's mainstream as fringe.

Founded in 2010, JSpace, as its website explains, provides Canadians with an alternative "to both the rigidly pro-Israel right and the anti-Israel left." The group supports a two-state solution to the Mideast conflict, "ardently" opposes Israel's Jewish settlements on the West Bank, and is strongly against all boycott, sanctions and divestment (BDS) efforts.

It is a "Jewish, progressive, pro-Israel, pro-peace voice" in Canada, not to be confused with JRAN, the Jewish Refugee Action Network, which advocates for immigration reform, or with JStreet, a U.S. group with a similar slant.

JSpace's inaugural national conference is slated to run all day Oct. 6 at the University of Toronto, and its roster of speakers includes Canadians and Israelis, Jews, Muslims and Christians, representing a wide political spectrum.

Though it self-describes as progressive – a term often derided as code for left/liberal – it sees itself as "a public voice of fairness (and) balance." It also claims that it's legitimate to criticize some of the policies of the Israeli government "while at the same time affirming Israel's basic rights as a sovereign state."

With about 100 people registered, the goal of the conference is to take JSpaceCanada "to the next stage in its development by widening the tent of vocal supporters of Israel who feel that constructive criticism of some of Israel's policies and practices is in the best interest of achieving her safety and security through a just and lasting peace," said the meeting's co-chair Karen Mock, a well-known human rights activist.

Ultimately, the task is "to generate concrete, practical recommendations for raising the voices of progressive Zionists in Canada and to engage people who may feel there is no place for them in the conversation at the Jewish community table," Mock said.

Scheduled speakers include Prof. Janice Stein of the University of Toronto and Prof. Mira Sucharov from Carleton University; columnist Shira Herzog; Raja Khouri of the Canadian Arab Institute, and Lois Wilson, former moderator of the United Church of Canada. Greetings and opening remarks are to come from D.J. Schneeweiss, Israel's consul general.

Topics to be explored are campus and union issues, Canada's foreign policy, interfaith relations and advocacy.

"We did attempt to create a roster of speakers who would provide a range of opinions, not necessarily those of JSpace Canada, to increase engagement, especially of the younger generation," said Mock.

JSpace was founded by members of downtown Toronto's First Narayever Congregation and spearheaded by Nora Gold, a former professor of social work at McMaster University who lived in Israel for six years.

She felt the need for a new moderate organization "because I was very concerned about anti-Israelism on the left," Gold said. "I don't consider myself on the left now, because I find the left anti-Israel."

"For people like me, the left has become a dirty word," Gold continued. "My politics are progressive and I'm very committed to anti-oppression work, human and civil rights. But there are many places on the left where I don't feel comfortable. And I would say that's true for many people involved in JSpace."

Gold concedes that people like her and those in JSpace "obviously are in a different place politically than many people in the mainstream community. We were looking for a place that would provide an alternative for Jews and for allied friends who aren't Jewish.

"The situation has become so polarized. Not only in Canada but around the world, anybody who said anything other than unconditional support for everything that the Israeli government does is labeled anti-Israel. It's ridiculous. It's paralyzing and it's dishonest. I know quite a number of people in the mainstream Jewish community who behind closed doors say they see things very much the way I do."

But is JSpace swimming against the current, given the shift by many Jewish voters to the Conservatives?

"It depends what river you swim in," Gold replies. "We're against various currents. We're certainly against the anti-Israel current. Do we disagree with the mainstream community on its perspective about the occupation and settlements? Absolutely we do."

But Gold believes that JSpace's views are shared by "many, many, many Canadian Jews, even if some of them, for their own reasons, won't come out and say so… I love Israel. We (in JSpace) all love Israel.

"The focus is to change the landscape for Canadian Jews and to change the conversation. We wanted to make space for this voice, and make the voice louder."

She suggests that perhaps the left feels it has not had any major successes since the end of apartheid in South Africa, "and in that sense (it) feels it has been a failure. The whole idea of boycotts and sanctions just came from a very ignorant and unsophisticated analysis of the Middle East."

On the other hand, "it's obvious that Israel's military might, for which we are profoundly grateful, is ultimately not going to be able to solve this. The only real security is going to come from diplomacy and agreements. Israel cannot be secure using military force and expansion as its main tools."

Gold stresses that "I don't think you'll find anybody at JSpace saying, 'Dismantle the settlements and it'll all be fine.' I wish something that simple were true."

Banish your writer's block

Jewish & Digital
Mark Mietklewicz

So you want to be a Jewish writer?

If the Great Jewish Novel is lurking inside you, but you can't get it out (or get it published), there are people who want to help. Now is the time to end the procrastination and excuses – and banish your Jewish writer's block.

The first and best stop is Erika Dreifus' website. Dreifus is both a published author – Quiet Americans: Stories (2011) – and a self-proclaimed "resource maven." Her lists are great (and up to date):

- Jewish writing conferences and courses
- Where to read (and publish) writing on Jewish themes,
- Jewish organizations to know about, and
- "Six Ways to Publicize Your Jewish Book" (and more). [http://bit.ly/jwrite1] You can follow her very active Twitter feed @erikadreifus.

Geared primarily toward women, the Jewish Writing Institute aims to "foster self discovery and intensify one's Jewish and spiritual identity." There are articles on a variety of topics, including "Jumpstarting your Writing," "Publishing in Jewish Newspapers and Magazines," and three views on using a pen name [http://bit.ly/jwrite2], as well as a companion blog. [http://bit.ly/jwrite3]

Speaking of blogs, if you love to write and are looking for a community that shares your passion, check out The Jewish Writing Project. This blog welcomes "stories, poems, memoirs, interviews–even random thoughts – as long as you keep the focus on being Jewish and on what being Jewish means to you." [http://bit.ly/jwrite4]

And what are Jewish writers writing about? Anne Rolphe is seeing a huge shift since the days of Bellow, Roth and Malamud, whose stories had "the voice of the American Jew moving into the mainstream [with] Yiddish jokes, sad stories, pressuring mothers, self-sacrificing mothers, beautiful blondes, pain of the soul, Jewish references everywhere, smart Jewish boys who always know the answers, and anti-Semitism."

According to Rolphe, the younger generation of writers such as Nathan Englander and Leon Wieseltier "was raised within the Jewish tradition, and although it has serious objections to how it was informed, it does not mumble out of a Jewish vacuum… Religion and tradition may be challenged or attacked, but only the way the son or daughter in a family will and the way a writer must – not vaguely, but precisely." National Jewish Book Award winner Dara Horn argues that Jewish writers have a responsibility to go beyond bagels and other stereotypes, and incorporate genuine Jewish themes into their writing. Of course, good writing is its own reward. But an adoring public doesn't hurt. Nor does acclaim and cash. Mitzvot mean more in Israel

Sephardi Window
Rabbi Ilan Acoca

Rabbi Shlomo Amar, former Sephardi chief rabbi of Israel, once related that when he and his family made aliyah from Morocco, his father, Eliyahu, fell to the ground and kissed it fervently. Rabbi Amar, 14 years old at the time, worried that his father had fainted and stepped forward to help him to his feet.

He heard his father say: "Master of the world! I thank You for the great kindness You've shown in bringing us here… I beg You for more time, until I merit reciting Kiddush this Friday night, and then You can take me to You. I just want to make Kiddush in the Holy Land."

In my recent trip to Israel, the words of Eliyhau Amar really hit home.

I felt connected to the land in a unique way from the time my feet hit the ground. The sense of holiness, joy, faith and peace were always on my mind.

This feeling got me thinking about the uniqueness of the Holy Land.

The Torah in Deuteronomy says "the eyes of HaShem, your God, are always upon it, from the beginning of the year to year's end."

A special Divine Providence graces Israel to the exclusion of all other lands.

Certainly, God reigns the world over. From our point of view, however, there's a great difference in our ability to receive the Divine content. Our sages teach us that God has placed angelic forces to rule over all other lands. Only in the Land of Israel is God's Providence direct, without any intermediary angels. Only in Israel is the worship of God pure without any barriers or impurities.

This is how the Ramban explains the Talmud's startling declaration that "All who live in Israel resemble someone who has a God, and all who live outside the land of Israel resemble someone who has no God." In the Diaspora, the worship of God only reaches the level of the celestial angels, whereas in Israel, Divine service is direct to God Himself, with no interference whatsoever.

This unique, life connection between HaShem and the Jewish People in Israel has very real quantitative and qualitative advantages. For instance, Israel is the land where the divine presence appears and where prophecy is transmitted to the Jewish people.

Israel is the only place on earth where the Torah can be observed in all its fullness. The commandments themselves were only given to be performed in Israel.

Our sages teach that the commandments we perform in the Diaspora are only reminders until we can return to Israel to observe them properly. The true value of the mitzvot comes only in Israel. Outside the land, the precepts have an educational value, but the Torah repeatedly tells us that Israel is the place for their performance. Accordingly, our rabbis have told us that dwelling in Israel is equal in weight to all of the commandments of the Torah.

In the Land of Israel, we're a living people. In the Diaspora, we're like bodies lacking spirit – the physical shell of a people without inner life.

Lessons in Jewish affiliation

Class Act
Daniel Held

In my last column, I described the rise of Hungarian anti-Semitism and the negative impact of the poisonous political climate on Jewish affiliation.

I lamented that "Of the estimated 100,000 Hungarian Jews, only 12,871 identified themselves as Jewish in the 2001 census, only 7,849 allocated taxes to the Jewish community in 2011, and only 6,000 attend High Holiday services."

Though startling, the numbers belie the evolving story of Jewish affiliation in Budapest.

During our last week in Budapest, the annual Jewish Summer Festival began. A mix of contemporary and classic Jewish music, theatre, movie screenings and food tastings, the festival attracts thousands of participants. Notably, this year the festival held an Israeli food fair in the main Budapest market.

Q6Q7, shorthand for the Jewish sixth and seventh quarters, hosts festivals for Chanukah and Passover. In addition to walking tours, wine tastings, poetry slams and plays, the festivals include Chanukah candle lighting and Passover seders. Events are held in public spaces: in cafés, bars, parks and on the streets of the Jewish quarter. Q6Q7 aims "to protect the special immovable heritage of the quarter, to reinvent functions, and prevent demolishment, and to regenerate Jewish life, and enhance civic activism."

Mózes-ház opened in January 2008. One of 59 Moishe Houses around the world, Mózes-ház residents organize Jewish holiday parties, movie nights, social action events, and a weekly Kabalat Shabbat followed by a potluck dinner which draws scores of participants.

The Jewish Summer Festival, Q6Q7 and Mózes-ház represent a new wave of affiliation, sharing three key characteristics.

They seamlessly integrate culture, socialization, religion and civic action. Q6Q7 includes concerts and potlucks, seders and community beautification projects, ritual events and gallery openings. These have long been present in Jewish programs, but the avant-garde nature of the events distinguishes them.

They are grass roots, driven by peers without traditional hierarchical structures. At Mózes-ház, residents initiate programming to which they invite their friends. Through network weaving, the chain of engagement grows outwards.

They are open to both Jews and non-Jews. Speaking to a generation reticent to separate itself from the broader community, and especially in Budapest where Jewishness is blurred by historical anti-Semitism, Communism and intermarriage, these programs attract young Jews, their peers, and a growing number of Judeophiles.

As traditional venues of Jewish engagement redefine their relationship with a new generation, new types of programs are springing up across North America. Notwithstanding the current challenges facing Hungarian Jewry, there are lessons to be learned from Budapest's creative and grass-roots forms of affiliation.

But there are also challenging questions: What does it mean to be actively involved in Jewish life? What metrics can we use to measure the impact of these programs on Jewish identity? Do these events represent sustained forms of Jewish engagement, or once-off episodes?

Most profoundly, we need to find new ways of measuring and maintaining Jewish affiliation. Checking off boxes on a census, making contributions to legacy agencies and attending synagogue services remain important forms of affiliation, but it is clear that they are not the only ways to demonstrate one's commitment to Judaism and the Jewish community.

Shuls need more spirituality

From the Bimah
Rabbi Yael Splansky

Tablet magazine's article, "High Holiday Services are Boring. Here's How We Can Fix Them," got a lot of play the week before Rosh Hashanah.

By contrast, this Yom Kippur marked the 100th anniversary of Franz Rosenzweig's dramatic return to Judaism. Rosenzweig was a man of words, but he never wrote nor spoke directly about what transpired in that synagogue in Berlin on Yom Kippur 1913. We can only piece the story together from hints he gave in letters to friends and later teachings about the power of Yom Kippur.

In Franz Rosenzweig: His Life and Thought, Nahum Glatzer distinguishes Rosenzweig's intentions for conversion from so many other German Jews of his time: "[H]e wished to enter Christianity as did its founders – as a Jew, not as a pagan. Rosenzweig attended the synagogue services on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur in preparation for the church."

He left his mother and hometown of Cassel to attend services in a small Orthodox shul in Berlin. What he experienced was a pivotal point in his life. He intended it to be his last ritual performed as a Jew. But 12 days later, he wrote to his friend Rudolf Ehrenberg, himself baptized as a child: "I must tell you something that will grieve you and may at first appear incomprehensible to you: after prolonged, and I believe thorough self-examination, I have reversed my decision. It no longer seems necessary to me, and therefore, being what I am, no longer possible. I will remain a Jew."

Glatzer considers that "no longer necessary" might imply an intellectual decision, but "no longer possible" hints at a radical personal experience.

Rosenzweig wasn't a mystic. He was a great and discriminating mind. Yet there was something about the experience in the synagogue that made him abandon his plans to leave Judaism behind. There was something on that Yom Kippur that sent him running in the direction of home again.

Rabbi Lawrence Hoffman of Hebrew Union College – Jewish Institute of Religion is developing his next "big idea." He uses hard data and sharp intuition to understand Jewish trends synagogues can respond.

Two years ago, he and Prof. Steven Cohen developed a survey of Jewish spirituality. They found that Jewish respondents scored significantly lower than Christians on all scales of spirituality. This isn't surprising, but what may be is a fascinating differential between generational responses. On all five scales of spiritual inclination – spiritual mentorship, religion, prayer, and spiritual experience – younger Jews scored higher than their elders.

Rabbi Hoffman argues that synagogues must "give serious thought to transforming themselves beyond the ethnic era into institutions that provide transcendent purpose that justifies Jewish identity." What must synagogues provide that people can't find anywhere else? What must they become expert in? Less programs, more relationships. Less talking about Judaism, and more experiencing Judaism.

Does the next generation of Jews resemble that of 1913? It could be they're less interested in the ethnic ties of their parents and grandparents and more in search of the intellectual and religious rigour of Rosenzweig.

Rabbi Hoffman is always onto something. All synagogues should consider his challenge to put matters of the spirit back at the centre.

Iranian leader refuses to comment on its scope

Rouhani acknowledges 'crime' of Holocaust

JTA

WASHINGTON — Iranian President Hassan Rouhani acknowledged the Holocaust as a crime against the Jews but refused to comment on its scope.

"I have said before that I am not a historian, and that when it comes to speaking of the dimensions of the Holocaust, it is the historians that should reflect on it," Rouhani told CNN in comments published Sept. 23 on its website.

"But in general, I can tell you that any crime that happens in history against humanity, including the crime the Nazis committed toward the Jews, as well as non-Jewish people, was reprehensible and condemnable as far as we are concerned," he said.

Rouhani also appeared to compare the Holocaust to Israel's treatment of the Palestinians.

"This does not mean that, on the other hand, you can say Nazis committed crimes against a group, now, therefore, they must usurp the land of another group and occupy it," he said. "This, too, is an act that should be condemned. There should be an evenhanded discussion."

Rouhani in an interview earlier this week with NBC declined to answer a question about the Holocaust, prompting Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to say that Rouhani differed little from his predecessor, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who denied the Holocaust.

Netanyahu, in a statement posted on his Facebook page, said Rouhani's alleged Holocaust denial was one reason he ordered the Israeli delegation to the United Nations not to be present when the Iranian leader spoke last week at the General Assembly.

"The Israeli delegation absented itself from Rouhani's speech in order not to grant legitimacy to a regime that does not recognize the existence of the Holocaust and which publicly declares its desire to wipe the State of Israel off the map," Netanyahu said.

U.S. President Barack Obama said at the General Assembly that he was ready to engage with Rouhani to bring about a diplomatic solution to tensions over Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program. Netanyahu has said he believes Rouhani's claims to moderation are a ruse.

Montreal lawyer and businessman, Michael Kastner, has donated One Million Dollars ($1,000,000.00) in honor of his courageous brother, Richard, to support OXFAM through the auspices of the Jewish Community Foundation. The monies shall be used to fund the distribution of lifesaving vaccines and/or other treatments to combat illnesses such as, but not limited to, tuberculosis and diarrhea, for vulnerable children living in developing countries, often where there is conflict as well as poverty.

Netanyahu final speaker at UN

Israeli media reports over the weekend quoted sources in the Israeli government as saying that Iran was only a few months away from possessing enough enriched uranium for a bomb, with one report going so far as to state that Tehran had already produced at least one such weapon.

Israel is concerned over the thaw in western-Iranian ties that has been developing at breathtaking pace in the last few days and culminated last Friday with a phone call between the American and Iranian presidents.

"I am going there to represent the interests of the people of Israel, our readiness to defend ourselves and our hope for peace," Netanyahu told reporters on the plane before taking off for the United States. "I will say the truth. In the face of the sweet talk and the smiles, one needs to tell the truth. Only the truth, today, is vital to the security of the world, and, of course, essential to the security of our country."

Netanyahu was scheduled to meet Obama at the White House on Monday. On Tuesday he was to be the final world leader to address this year's UN General Assembly in New York.

During his address to the General Assembly in 2012, Netanyahu famously produced a cartoon diagram of a bomb and went on to elucidate his "red line" for Iran's nuclear program: 90 per cent of the amount of enriched uranium required to produce an atomic weapon.

While beseeching Obama to present a "credible" military deterrent of his own, Netanyahu has threatened to order a strike on Iran's nuclear facilities if Tehran threatened to cross that "red line."

Netanyahu has said he regards Iran's recent outreach as a "smokescreen" designed to "fool" the West while the regime advances toward a nuclear weapons capability. He has set out conditions that he wants the international community to maintain before any reduction in economic sanctions.

Netanyahu's meeting with Obama would mark the first time the two leaders have sat together since the American president's March visit to Israel, and since the historic phone call between Obama and Rouhani – the latest in a series of developments last week that signalled a warming of ties between Iran and the United States. The last time a sitting U.S. president spoke to a sitting Iranian president was before the Islamic Revolution in 1979.

Netanyahu issued no direct comment on the Obama-Rouhani conversation, and he instructed his ministers to remain mum. He intended to discuss Israel's position on the Iranian president's charm offensive – which included more benevolent rhetoric on ties with the United States and the West, a stated willingness to compromise on transparency of the Iranian nuclear program and an acknowledgement that the Holocaust occurred – during his meetings with senior U.S. officials. He was also to make a public plea against easing the sanctions on the regime during his speech Tuesday to the General Assembly.

"Netanyahu understands that there is a lot of euphoria," according to an unnamed senior Israeli official quoted by the New York Times. "Netanyahu knows that people in the international community will want to believe. I think you'll see in his remarks a lot of facts, a lot of facts that no one denies."

Canada skeptical about Iran's charm offensive

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Despite the phone call between U.S. President Barack Obama and Iranian President Hassan Rouhani that marks the first time since the 1979 revolution that the two countries' leaders spoke, Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird called on foreign leaders to maintain sanctions against Iran.

"Now is the time for the global community to maintain tough sanctions against Iran in order that it takes a different path on its nuclear program," Baird said in his Sept. 30 address at the UN General Assembly.

Obama extended an olive branch to Iran during his speech at the General Assembly last week, promising that his administration would focus on improving tensions between Iran and the West over its nuclear program.

Rouhani pledged to "remove mutual uncertainties with full transparency," but only if Iran could continue uranium enrichment for what he said were peaceful purposes.

Both Baird and Prime Minister Stephen Harper remain cautious about putting too much stock into Rouhani's charm offensive.

Following Obama's UN address last week, Harper said he "would not fault President Obama and our allies for trying, but my sincere advice would be, when it comes to the government of Iran, that we should carefully monitor deeds far more than words."

Baird said Canada would like to see Iran put words into practice when it comes to its nuclear program, its support of terrorism and its human rights record.

"Sound bites do not remove threats to global security. Kind words, a smile and a charm offensive are not a substitute for real action," he said.

Canada's relationship with Iran remains strained since Canada severed diplomatic ties with the regime last year, calling it a state sponsor of terrorism.

"We ended that diplomatic presence because of our increased uncertainty about the safety of our personnel in Iran and we will not return until we think those kinds of questions can be adequately addressed," Harper said.

In November, Canada is planning to present the United Nations with a resolution condemning Iran's human rights record.

Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs CEO Shimon Fogel, said he is "very satisfied with the Canadian response."

He referred to Baird's speech at the UN, where he spoke about "our collective responsibility to ensure that rhetoric is matched by more meaningful demonstration in actions."

In Rouhani's former position as a lead negotiator, he publicly boasted about "a strategy of delay, denial and deception... where they would engage in discussions while, at the same time, they were accelerating the process of trying to secure enriched uranium," Fogel said.

"Given his own record, we have to be very suspicious of these efforts to reach out to the international community as nothing more than a ploy to disguise their efforts to continue with the program."

Iran approves joint probe of AMIA bombing

JTA

BUENOS AIRES — Iran approved the memorandum signed nine months ago with Argentina to jointly probe the 1994 bombing of the AMIA Jewish centre in Buenos Aires.

Iranian Foreign Minister Mohammad Javad Zarif said Saturday at UN headquarters in New York that the blateral agreement was approved by "competent authorities" in his country, according to the Buenos Aires Herald newspaper.

Zarif and his Argentine counterpart, Hector Timerman, jointly announced the approval by the Iranians at the United Nations.

In her address last week before the UN General Assembly, Argentine President Cristina Fernandez called on Iran to provide an update on the status of the memorandum.

"We are hoping they will tell us that the agreement has been approved [in Iran] and to set a date when a judge will be able to fly to Tehran," she told the assembly.

There has been no agreement on a date for Argentine investigators to travel to Iran to interview suspects. The next step will be the exchange of documents officially announcing that the governments have approved the memorandum of understanding.

The next bilateral meeting will be held in early November in Geneva. Both governments then must agree on the details and procedures of the Truth Commission made up of independent legal experts, from neither Argentina and Iran, who will be analyzing the evidence gathered on the AMIA attack and issue a report.

The bilateral accord to jointly investigate the July 1994 AMIA bombing came in January. The attack in Argentina's capital city killed 85 and injured hundreds.

Argentina's Jewish community, international Jewish groups, Israel and the United States have protested the agreement.

Israel warned Kenya of terror attack risk

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel was among the countries that warned Kenya's government about the high risk of a terrorist attack in the months before the recent attack on a Nairobi mall.

"Israel had warned of attacks on their business interests, but apart from just being tossed from one office to another, nothing was taken out of the intelligence reports," an anonymous official told the French news agency AFP in a report released Sunday.

A report in the Kenyan daily the Nation, citing a leaked intelligence report, said the treasury, interior, foreign affairs and defence ministers, as well as the army chief, had been told of the high risk of a terror attack, according to AFP.

AFP cited security sources as saying that "Israeli services are playing a lead role in the ongoing investigation into the attack."

Israeli defence officials last week confirmed that a security team arrived in Nairobi within hours of the hostage crisis at the Westgate Mall. The officials said the team advised Kenya authorities on the terrorist standoff at the upscale mall and did not include combat units.

At least 68 people were killed in the four-day siege, in which non-Muslims were singled out for death. Some 175 people were injured in the attack.

One Israeli was injured and three others escaped harm, according to Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Two Canadians were killed and two others were injured.

The five-storey shopping centre features several Israeli-owned outlets, according to wire services. Among them is the ArtCaffe – the attack by eight gunmen took place near the coffee shop and bakery.

Members of Al Shabab, a Somalia-based terror group linked to Al Qaeda, claimed responsibility for the attack. Al Shabab said the attack was revenge for Kenya's military operations in Somalia that began nearly two years ago.

Circumcision ban introduced in Sweden

JTA

STOCKHOLM — A motion to ban the non-medical circumcision of males younger than 18 has been presented to the Swedish parliament.

Two lawmakers from the rightist Sweden Democrats party, noting that female genital mutilation is illegal in Sweden, submitted the motion to the Riksdag on Sept. 24. A vote on it has not been set.

Bjorn Soder and Per Ramhorn wrote in the measure that "boys should have the same right to avoid both complications of reduced sensitivity in the genitals, painful erections, increased risk of kidney damage and psychological distress by permanent removal, and the tremendous violation of privacy that circumcision actually means."

The motion proposes to scrap legislation from 2001 that says circumcision of newborns is permissible if it is performed by a "licensed professional."

Jewish ritual circumcisers, or mohelim, in Sweden receive their licenses from the country's health board, but a nurse or doctor must still be present when they perform the procedure.

The anti-immigration Sweden Democrats party was established in 1988 but only made it into parliament following unprecedented gains in the 2010 elections, when it garnered 5.7 per cent of the votes, or 20 seats out of 349 in Sweden's parliament. The opposition party is the sixth-largest faction in the Riksdag.

Rabbi Pinchas Goldschmidt, president of the European Conference of Rabbis, said the proposal "betrays a dangerous ignorance of what is involved in the practice of milah as compared with the abhorrent practice of female genital mutilation."

The motion's authors "seem to have overlooked the fact that if circumcision were to be banned, that would itself represent the most serious violation of human rights in recent memory," he added in a statement.

Ritual circumcision of underage boys increasingly has come under attack in Scandinavia, both by left-wing secularists as well as right-wingers who fear the influence of immigration from Muslim countries.

The opposition follows a ruling last year by a German court in Cologne that ritual circumcision amounted to a criminal act. The ruling was overturned but triggered temporary bans in Austria and Switzerland.

Sweden has about 20,000 Jews and 500,000 Muslims, according to a U.S. State Department report from 2011.

Firm offers Israeli security in Canada

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

There's big money in the security software business. Just a month or two ago, the Israeli-based company, Trusteer, which makes security software to protect data from malware attacks, was acquired by tech giant IBM in a deal rumoured to be worth between $800 million and $1 billion (US).

It's no surprise that Israeli firms are at the forefront of the security industry – whether it's at the airport, around infrastructure installations or in the cyber sphere.

Consider the neighbourhood Israel lives in. Israeli firms have long been recognized as pioneers in security arrangements to go along with the country's reputation as a high-tech innovator. Combining the two has long been an Israeli specialty and recently, Pillar Canada Corporation announced it has been named the Canadian representative of Foresight Prudence, an Israeli company at the forefront of protecting businesses and infrastructure sites from terrorist attacks. The Israeli company employs state-of-the-art systems run on proprietary software programs to protect potential high value targets from terrorist attack, said Arie Raif, president and CEO of Pillar.

"Foresight Prudence fights what is known in our industry as 'the age of terror.' We live in an age of terrorism and we fight it on four fronts."

The company, Raif continued, has particular expertise in suppressing global terrorism, in risk management – coping with "mega-disasters" that result from terrorism or "mega-crimes" – preventing cyber-attacks, and responding to natural disasters.

The protection component presented by the company is capable of assessing dangers, prioritizing responses, mitigating damages and managing incidents.

"In other words, it's homeland security solutions," Raif said.

A glance at Foresight Prudence's Petach Tikvah-based management team quickly demonstrates the company's security and intelligence expertise was hard earned.

The company's CEO, Shlomo Mofaz, retired from the Israeli Defence Forces as a colonel after more than 30 years in the intelligence and counterterrorism field. Before founding Foresight Prudence, Mofaz established and managed Insightin LTD, a company specializing in intelligence, command and control, and risk assessment solutions.

Shmuel Sasson, the company's executive vice-president, served for more than 23 years in the Israel Security Agency – also known as Shin Bet, the country's internal security force. Among the management positions he held were director of the operations department in the Israeli Dignitary and Official Delegations Protection Unit and regional security director for western Europe, with responsibility for national security abroad. He later served as head of security for El-Al Airlines.

With that sort of pedigree, coupled with the company's unique software solutions Raif is confident Pillar can appeal to Canadian clients.

"Israeli experience of years of success in fighting terrorism comes into what we are offering," he said.

"Israel does it best. Experience matters, track record matters, success matters."

In addition to the expertise offered by Foresight Prudence's top management, Oren Ben-Tovim "is the brains behind many of the systems developed by Foresight," Raif stated.

A lieutenant-colonel in the IDF reserves, Ben-Tovim served as the IDF's chief knowledge officer and head of information and knowledge management.

"He is the brains behind many of the systems developed by Foresight... They're joined by scientists who have developed protection and risk management systems," said Raif.

DJ Schneeweiss, Israel's consul general in Toronto, said the country "has a proven track record with the skills and capacities that are recognized around the world."

Arie Raif

Although he wouldn't comment on any specific company, he said Israeli experiences are "relevant to every advanced country."

That goes beyond security considerations to other aspects of its high-tech economy.

"The success of any one company, in its dealings with Canada is good for all. It creates awareness of what Israel has to offer," he said.

Foresight Prudence has had many high profile clients, but perhaps its biggest project was designing the protection system for the Athens Olympic Games, Raif said.

Raif believes the Canadian market offers numerous potential clients for Pillar. They range from government facilities; the energy sphere; power plants; the aviation sector; the trucking and rail business; critical infrastructure, such as water filtration plants; mining operations; and telecommunications.

And that list is far from exhaustive, said Raif. "Anything that's an inviting target for terror," would come under the company's purview, he said.

"In Canada, Pillar is going to offer the services of Foresight Prudence to make sure that incidents like [the planned Via Rail attack] don't happen," he said.

"Those who thought that terrorism is gone, or who believe they have the solution to global terrorism, cyber-terrorism, or mega-crimes, live in a world of illusion. We do not live in some kind of a dream. This is real," he added.

Billionaire funds Technion project

David Shamah
The Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — The richest man in Asia is giving $130 million (all figures U.S.) to the Technion to build a research centre in China. Li Ka Shing, estimated to be worth some $31 billion – and, according to Forbes, the world's eighth-richest man – is funding the joint project between the Technion and Shantou University, located in Guangdong Province.

The new centre, to be called the Technion Guangdong Institute of Technology (TGIT), will be located on its own 330,000-square-metre campus to be built by the local government, while the Li Ka Shing Foundation (LKSF) will fund projects and programs at the new centre. LKSF is the main funding arm for Shantou, providing nearly all of the school's HK$6 billion endowment. The $130 million gift for the joint Technion-Shantou project, meanwhile, constitutes the largest gift ever to the Technion, and one of the largest to any Israeli school.

TGIT will begin offering undergraduate programs in civil and environmental engineering and computer sciences in the academic year beginning in November. Next year, the new joint project will conduct life sciences research to tackle medical and social issues, including improvements in clinical diagnosis procedures. By 2020, the institute will offer courses in other engineering-related fields, from mechanical to aerospace engineering.

The roots of the partnership go back to 2011, when LKSF officials visited the Technion, followed by a reciprocal visit to China by Technion President Dr. Peretz Lavie.

As a result of that 2011 trip, Li Ka Shing became interested in Israeli hi-tech and decided to invest in several Israeli start-ups, including Waze. Part of the money being used to fund the new project is coming out of the profit that Li earned when Google bought Waze earlier this year for some $900 million, LKSF said.

For China, said Professor Gu Peihua, provost of Shantou, the Technion is a role model for China to follow. Within a few decades, Gu said, he expected TGIT to become one of the best technological schools in Asia, if not the world.

Canada's Jewish community explored

Martin Lockshin
Special to The CJN

Fewer than three per cent of the world's Jews live in Canada, yet our community is the fourth-largest in the world. If current intermarriage, immigration and emigration patterns continue, the Canadian Jewish community could take over third place from France in the next 10 or 20 years.

Thus Canada figures in a new series of books being published by Academic Studies Press in the United States, Jews in Space and Time. For the Canadian volume, they chose one of the acknowledged leaders in the field of Canadian Jewish studies, Prof. Ira Robinson of Concordia University, as the editor. Robinson gathered an impressive team of scholars to contribute chapters and titled the volume Canada's Jews in Time, Space and Spirit.

This ambitious book attempts to cover Canada both geographically and temporally. The book refers to events from the 18th century up to and including the current decade. It contains chapters on "Atlantic Canada," "Vancouver" and most places in between. Two valuable overview chapters are contributed by two of my York University colleagues. David Koffman writes on the state of the field of scholarly Canadian Jewish studies, and Randall Schnoor analyzes demographic data about Canada's Jews.

Jews who live in Toronto and others interested in this thriving community (probably the city with the 15th-largest number of Jews in the world) will find particular interest in the essay of another of my York University colleagues, Michael Brown, "Steps Forward and Steps Backward: Toronto Jewry in the Beginning of the Second Decade of the Twenty-First Century." Brown doesn't shy away from some of the more controversial aspects of Toronto's recent Jewish history, such as the abrupt closing of the Board of Jewish Education and the abolishment of Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canada-Israel Committee, the University Outreach Committee, and National Jewish Campus Life, the latter four all folded into one larger organization, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs. Brown describes all these moves with the objectivity of the fine historian that he is, but the careful reader will be able to tell what he thinks.

The book has some unexpected imbalances. For example, of the four chapters in a row on Orthodox, chassidic, Reform and Conservative Judaism in Canada, the first, on Orthodoxy, is 3-1/2 pages long. Each of the other three chapters is at least three times as long. The disparity is not only one of length. While the other three chapters deal with significant issues confronting Canada's chassidic, Reform and Conservative communities, the chapter on Orthodoxy mentions no issues, concerns or problems.

In fact, Canada's Orthodox community faces many interesting tensions, some of them virtually unique to Canada.

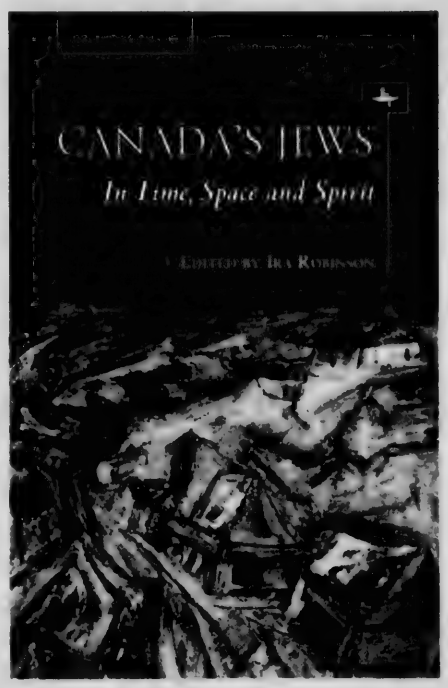
Due to lobbying efforts by Canadian Jews, Canada has some of the best state legislation in the world to protect women from estranged husbands who withhold a get, a Jewish divorce. Nevertheless, in some (but not all) Canadian cities, rabbinical courts are reluctant to use the force of the secular courts to deal with the problem of these stranded women. In this area, as in others (such as conversion standards), serious conflict exists between modern and less modern elements of Canada's Orthodox rabbinate. I was disappointed that none of this appeared in the book, but whenever a book consists of essays from different authors, it's hard to achieve true balance.

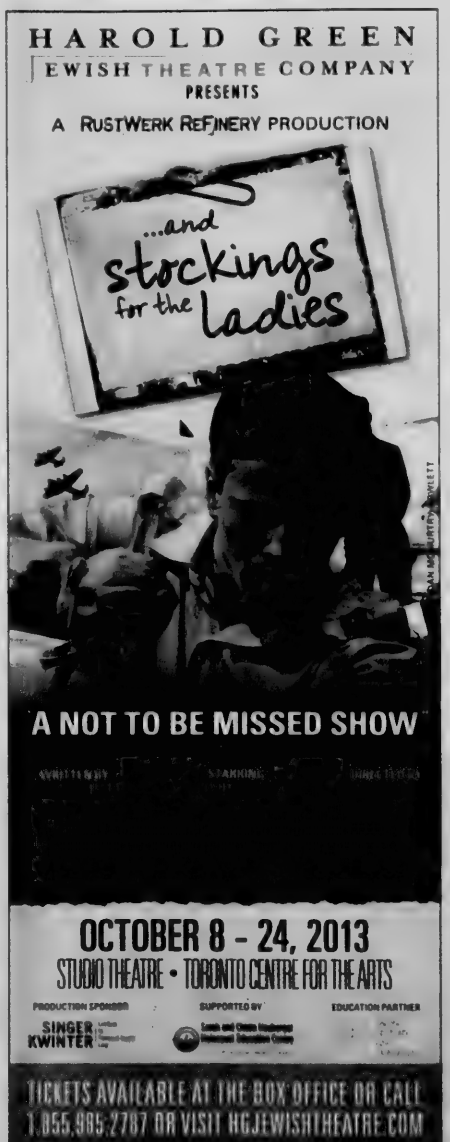
One theme that runs through many essays is anti-Semitism in Canada. Jack Lipinsky's essay traces how concerns about anti-Semitism led to the creation of various Jewish community organizations in the first half of the 20th century. These concerns were certainly real. Lipinsky describes how in 1910, a speaker at a Catholic Youth conference in Quebec dredged up "a host of medieval calumnies against Jews: they were thieves, deceitful in business, corrupters of women and spreaders of disease." He "repeated the age-old canard of the blood libel and urged the Canadian government to revoke the Jews' citizenship rights."

Other essays make it clear that these problems weren't limited to Quebec. In 1924, the Toronto Telegram (the newspaper that, a few years later, my parents would read every day) proclaimed that, "An influx of Jews puts a worm next to the kernel of every fair city where they get a hold. These people have no national tradition... They engage in the wars of no country, but flit from one to another under passports changed with chameleon swiftness, following up the wind the smell of lucre." Other quotations from 20th-century Canadian anti-Semites manage to accuse Jews of being both Communists and greedy capitalists.

Brown's chapter on Toronto, mentioned above, finishes with a lengthy micro-study of recent events at York University that have led some to argue that anti-Semitism is alive and well there. He quotes Jason Kenney, then Canada's minister of citizenship, immigration and multiculturalism, who implausibly claimed a few years ago that at York we have seen "what is reminiscent of the ancient pogroms." Not to be outdone, one hot-headed Toronto rabbi is quoted accusing a senior York administrator of "again show[ing] his amazing tolerance for anti-Semitism and lack of vigilance regarding the feeling of safety for Jewish students on campus."

I encourage everyone to read Brown's insider analysis of the situation at York. But I will share my own assessment: judicious readers of this book will find an inverse relationship over the years between the intensity of the problem of Canadian anti-Semitism and the intensity of the reaction to it.





A tale of two Chabads in Tokyo, Japan

Emma Csillag and Ron Csillag
Special to The CJN

TOKYO — Japan, with no more than 1,000 Jews at any time, reminds one of the joke about a Jewish man stranded on a desert island, and who builds two synagogues. One he uses, and the other, "I wouldn't set foot in."

Tokyo, a sprawling metropolis of 13 million residents and 10 million daily commuters, has not one but two Chabad centres – and they are not on speaking terms.

Rabbi David Kunin, spiritual leader of Tokyo's only non-Chabad shul, located in the Jewish Community of Japan building in the city's leafy Shibuya district, takes no pleasure in describing the animosity between the rival Chabads.

The New York-born Rabbi Kunin, who's fresh in Tokyo, having only recently arrived from Edmonton, where he served at Beth Shalom Synagogue for a decade, put it discreetly: One Chabad is part of the movement that believes its late leader, Menachem Mendel Schneerson, who died in 1994, is the messiah. The other one does not.

"They don't talk to each other," says Rabbi Kunin, leaving it at that.

When we attended Rosh Hashanah services at the Tokyo JCC, Rabbi Kunin presided before about 50 worshippers on day one (with kids in the basement), and maybe 20 on day two. Both were warm, inclusive and familiar, and honours were freely handed out to newbies (we carried and dressed the Torah).

The sole concession to our location was the customary prayer to the host country. Instead of Canada, a prayer for the welfare of Japan was recited – in Japanese. Everything else could have come from any fully egalitarian North American synagogue.

Worshippers were mainly from English-speaking countries: Canada, the U.S., Britain and Australia. Some ex-pats live here full time but most Jews are transient: Teachers, diplomats, business people, military types, and young backpacking Israelis. There were some Israelis in attendance, including the chazzan.

There were a few Japanese faces, the results of inter-marriages. The loudest and most mellifluous voice belonged to a middle-aged Japanese lady who recited every verse, prayer and hymn in impeccable Hebrew.

The building has a very Japanese esthetic. Simple beech-coloured strips of wood arch over the walls onto the ceiling in the sanctuary. The rest of the three-storey structure is elegant, with clean lines. There are meeting rooms, a lounge, mikvah, classrooms, gift shop and a rooftop terrace. The "JJBA" – the Japanese & Jewish Business Association – is advertised.

The community centre houses a synagogue inside. [Ron Csillag photos]

Emma Csillag stands in front of the Jewish Community of Japan building.

The site on which the building stands was acquired in 1952 and a synagogue was established the following year. (The opening ceremony was attended by Japan's Prince and Princess Mikasa). The structure was torn down in 2008 and a new modern building, designed by renowned architect Fumiko Maki, was inaugurated in 2009.

Jewish traders and merchants came to Japan at least around the 17th century, but the first confirmed community was in Yokohama in 1861. Synagogues were established in Nagasaki in 1894, in Kobe in 1937 (it was damaged in the 1995 earthquake and restored with the help of Vancouver's Jewish community), and finally, in Tokyo.

Rabbi Kunin is not the only rabbi with a Canadian connection to Japan: Rabbi Carnie Shalom Rose of Winnipeg served here in the late 1990s.

Following services, we lunch with the rabbi, who has mostly fond memories of Edmonton, a young man from aboard the carrier USS George Washington, and Capt. Bruce "Skip" Walker, military attaché at Canada's embassy and his family. The rabbi's wife was to follow as soon as their dogs had cleared quarantine. The chicken soup and kosher chicken, flown in from the U.S., tasted like home.

Ask what Japan's relations with Israel are like, and people shrug. "Mostly benign neglect," someone says. That may be true at the highest levels, but the two countries routinely exchange missions in technology and agriculture. Following the 2011 tsunami and earthquake, Israel sent emergency medical teams for which Japan was grateful, even more so after the Israelis left behind all their equipment. The Israelis here point out that Japan is highly dependent on Arab oil.

Anti-Semitism is virtually non-existent, especially in a land where people routinely meld Buddhist traditions with Shinto, the native religion, and with Christian weddings and Christmas celebrations thrown in.

On leaving, we hear "Shana Tova" mixed with domo arigato, Japanese for "thank you."

ANNE MIRVISH PROVIDED ARTISTIC VISION TO HONEST ED

Anne Mirvish, artist and wife of the late "Honest" Ed Mirvish, has died in Toronto at the age of 94.

She was born Anne Macklin in Hamilton, Ont., in 1919. As a child, she took piano lessons, was a good singer and loved to draw. After high school she worked in an office.

She married Mirvish in 1941 and helped him establish a small women's sportswear store at the corner of Bathurst and Bloor with money attained by cashing her life insurance policy. At one point the store was called Anne & Eddie's. In 1948 the store expanded over a few adjacent storefronts and became known as Honest Ed's, now a famous bargain emporium. (Ed Mirvish died in 2007.)

Anne studied art periodically in Toronto, attended the Banff School of Fine Art in the 1950s, and studied with American abstract expressionist Paul Burlin in New York in 1962. She specialized in sculpture and for her art career took the name Anne Lazare, using her mother's maiden name.

She worked in cast bronze, pewter, silver, wood, marble and other materials. Her sculptures were in the collections of the Smithsonian Institute in Washington and the National Archives of Canada. Over the last decade she had several exhibitions in the John B. Aird Gallery, Canadian Sculpture Centre and other venues.

A devotee of theatre and opera, she was instrumental in persuading her husband to purchase the dilapidated Royal Alexandra Theatre in Toronto in 1964, thus launching his long career as a theatre impresario. She also persuaded him to buy up an entire city block of houses on Markham street and convert them into an artists' colony. "I'm the storekeeper," Ed once explained. "Anne is the inspiration."

Her influence is equally visible in her son, David Mirvish, the art collector and theatre impresario who took over and expanded upon his father's interests in the live theatre business.

Anne was president of a Hadassah chapter and was involved with the National Council of Jewish Women, Mount Sinai Hospital, Baycrest Women's Auxiliary, Boys Town Jerusalem, Canadian Mental Health Association and other organizations. She was a patron of the Canadian Opera Company and a life member of the Art Gallery of Ontario and the Royal Ontario Museum.

LGBT leader pushes for acceptance and inclusivity

Cara Stern
Staff reporter

Justine Apple led Kulanu's march at the 2013 Pride parade in Toronto.

Justine Apple says it wouldn't be an exaggeration to say that Kulanu Toronto has saved lives.

"Kulanu has and will continue to save the lives of many people, younger and older, who have nowhere to turn and are often rejected by their families and their friends," says the executive director of the gay Jewish community group.

Founded in 2000, Kulanu Toronto, gives lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender (LGBT) Jews a place to connect with people who can relate to their experiences. It also seeks to educate the community and encourage people to fully include gay Jews.

"People need to open their eyes and realize that queer Jews need to be recognized," Apple says. "Kulanu Toronto provides such a vital part of the fabric of the Jewish community."

Apple says she came out as a lesbian to her family and close friends when she was 21. It wasn't an easy task.

"I was struggling at the time because my parents were having a difficult time with the realization that their eldest daughter was gay," she says. "At the time I felt very ignored in conversation, and I felt quite isolated."

A woman she was dating suggested they try out a Kulanu event. There, Apple met other Jews whose ability to relate to her situation gave her a sense of belonging.

"It was mainly women who shared my struggles and my values and my interests," she says.

"That's what brought us all together."

Five years ago, Apple was invited to join the executive committee for Kulanu, and within a year, because of her passion and leadership potential, she was asked to be executive director.

It's a tough position, she says. It requires a huge time commitment despite being a volunteer position. But she describes it as highly rewarding.

"I get to meet and work with amazing queer Jews of all ages and Jewish affiliations," she says.

"I love to see our members developing friendships with each other. It's beautiful to see."

Despite the hard work, she says she continues to do it because it gives her the chance to help LGBT Jews feel a sense of belonging and comfort.

"When I came out 15 years ago – and it feels like yesterday – I was 21 and I felt lots of backlash," she says. "I spent months and years feeling very isolated, very guilty, very ashamed."

She continued to attend her Orthodox synagogue throughout her 20s but she avoided discussing her sexual orientation especially with the rabbi who, at the time, refused to acknowledge the LGBT members of the congregation.

But Kulanu helped her realize there was nothing wrong with being both gay and Jewish.

"I was still the same special Justine I'd been before I came out," she says.

Over time, she says, she even began to feel proud of her identity.

Eventually, Apple's mother also grew more comfortable with her daughter's sexual orientation, and she even began talking to friends and family about the situation, Apple says. Having her mother's acceptance helped, and these days, her family is fully accepting of her – including her extended family members who identify as Orthodox.

Acceptance from the more observant parts of the community has been growing too, although there's a still a lot of room for improvement.

This year representatives from Conservative synagogues joined the Kulanu contingent at the annual Pride parade, and the Toronto Board of Rabbis offered its support.

Oddly enough, the inclusion of an anti-Israel group, Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA), in the Toronto Pride parade over the past few years has helped bring Kulanu into the public eye, Apple says.

Members of the media have asked Kulanu to respond to QuAIA's actions. At the Pride parade, many people walking with Kulanu told The CJN that QuAIA's presence, and support for Israel, did influence their decision to march.

Although QuAIA has ironically helped raise Kulanu's profile, Apple says she's hoping to shift the media focus back to spreading a positive and inclusive message, rather than focusing on condeming QuAIA's actions.

To that end, she's working on a plan to ensure that Kulanu's presence at the international event, WorldPride 2014, which will be held in Toronto next summer, will serve to further the acceptance of LGBT Jews in Toronto. She says they're even considering having a float in the parade.

Apple says she's hoping the number of supporters will continue to grow, as well as the number of members of Kulanu.

Currently there are about 400 people on the group's mailing list. Apple's vision for Kulanu's future also involves having a space for the group to operate.

"When they're with us, they feel special and welcome and acknowledged," she says, so having a permanent space would be very helpful.

"It's people coming together in a welcoming, inclusive space where they feel comfortable to express their Jewish and LGBT identities."

Whither the chicken?

Kosher Living
Richard Rabkin

"Where did all the kosher chicken go?"

We've been fielding this question at the Kashruth Council of Canada (COR) for the last couple of months, and perhaps this new column provides a good opportunity to address this question, as well as other frequently asked questions that we receive.

So, about the chicken.

As reported in these pages, last April, Chai Kosher Poultry suddenly announced that it would be closing its operations as of May 3, 2013. True to their word, after more than 25 years serving the kosher community, the owners closed the business. This left Marvid Poultry in Montreal as the only Canadian supplier of kosher poultry.

Approximately five months have passed, and while Marvid has thankfully worked extremely hard – I would even say valiantly – to accommodate the increase in demand, many people have still asked us why another Canadian poultry processor hasn't stepped forward. Good question. Let's analyze what is required to start a new kosher poultry processor in Canada.

First, from a religious perspective, shchitah (ritual slaughter) obviously requires trained shochtim. They have to be pious individuals who are experts in their field. Jewish law dictates that the chickens must be slaughtered with a special knife that contains not even the slightest nick that could cause unnecessary pain to the animal even for a split second. The blood must then be removed entirely through an intensive process of purging, soaking, salting and rinsing. Perhaps it is this extra care that makes even many non-kosher consumers prefer kosher meat. In fact, I've read that Martha Stewart recommends using kosher chickens (just in case you thought I made that up).

But the shochet is not the only one overseeing shchitah. In Canada, the processing of food, and in particular meat, is governed by the Canadian Food Inspection Agency (CFIA). The CFIA's regulations are quite rigorous – Canadians should be thankful that the agency is in charge of our food safety. But building a new chicken slaughterhouse that complies with the CFIA's standards isn't cheap. Put a few million dollars into the business plan for that.

Even if you have the shochtim and a CFIA-compliant plant, you can't just start producing kosher chickens. You need "quota," or more specifically, "plant supply quota."

The Canadian farming industry is governed by a process called "supply management," which is managed by the government to eliminate volatility that could leave some farmers vulnerable.

So, for example, let's say Ottawa decides that the total allotment for Canadian chickens next year will be 10 million chickens. Through the Chicken Farmers of Canada (CFC), they make an allotment to each province – let's say in our example that each of the 10 provinces gets one million chickens. The provincial body – in Ontario's case it is the Chicken Farmers of Ontario (CFO) – will then apportion a percentage of that allotment to each of its chicken producers based on their respective quota allotment.

Quotas can become quite valuable, and Chai sold its quota to a non-kosher processor. So a new kosher entrant would have to obtain new quota. But remember: there's a specific allotment for the entire province – one million in our example. So if a new kosher operator were to apply for quota, the other (non-kosher) processors would say, "If they give you a 100,000 quota, you are diluting the value of my quota, because it comes off the top of the allotment for the entire province."

So as you can see, it's complicated.

But the Kashruth Council has been actively engaged with this issue. We have lobbied federal and provincial politicians, we have sought input from community stakeholders and we have mobilized community rabbis. I even went myself to a meeting of the Chicken Farmers of Ontario and made a presentation on behalf of the kosher community. They were very receptive and are working on finding some sort of solution, but they admitted the system is complex and that a resolution won't happen overnight.

Chai was processing approximately 2.4 million chickens per year. So there's a significant business opportunity for the right party and there are entrepreneurs who are working on this project. Until then, kosher chicken is still available at all of the major retailers that serve the kosher community. And if anyone ever wants chicken soup, they're invited to my house – I'm sure my wife won't mind.

Get out of the dinner rut

Sue Epstein
Special to The CJN

Getting into a "meal rut" happens to us all. And it is one of the easiest ruts to get into. You try a new recipe and the family loves it. Or it was a big hit with your Shabbat guests. And it was so quick and easy to make. What more could you ask for? Next thing you know you're making it so often your family groans when you serve it.

The "experts" will tell you that the key to avoiding meal rut is meal planning. If you're one of those who just can't plan ahead, don't worry about it. Sometimes children go through a macaroni and cheese or hot dog (or some other food) phase where that's the only thing they'll eat. This usually doesn't last long, however, and when that phase is over they don't even want to look at that formerly favoured food. There are also those families where Tuesday night is meatloaf night and Thursday night is spaghetti night. If your family doesn't mind this you've got it made!

But if they do object, try to watch that repetition and try to vary your meals. Even if you're not an experimental cook, promise yourself to try one new recipe a week, or every other week – and don't make the same food so often that your family gets tired of it. If you always make Shepherd's Pie from the leftover brisket, this week make barbecued beef with the leftovers. (Simply slice the meat and pour a bottle of barbecue sauce over it and reheat.)

Here are two dishes that I think your family will love

MAPLE MUSTARD HONEY STYLE RIBS

This is a great dish to make on a day when you're going to be busy. Put it all in your crock pot and come home at the end of the day to a delicious hot meal.

1 large onion, cut into 1/4 in. slices, separated into rings
1/3 C. maple syrup
1/4 C. Dijon mustard
2 1/2 to 3 lbs. beef short ribs, trimmed of fat

Place onion rings in 4 qt. crock-pot.

In small bowl, combine syrup and mustard; mix well. Spread evenly on ribs. Place coated ribs over onion. Cover; cook on low setting for at least 8 hours or until ribs are tender. If desired, serve with additional mustard. (Makes 4 servings)

CHICKEN COBBLER

6 skinless, boneless chicken thighs or breasts salt and pepper
1 cup frozen peas
1/4 cup vegetable oil
1/2 cup chopped onion
1/3 cup flour
1/4 tsp. dried tarragon, crushed
2 cups chicken broth
2 cups flour
1 cup coarsely shredded carrot
2 tbsp. sugar
1 tbsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. salt
1 1/3 cups pareve milk or chicken broth

Preheat oven to 400 degree. Arrange chicken in a 13 x 9 x 2 in. baking pan.

Season with salt and pepper. Bake for 20 minutes or until chicken is no longer pink and juices run clear; set aside.

In a medium saucepan combine 2 tbsp. of the oil and chopped onion. Cook and stir over medium heat for 5 minutes or until onion is tender. Stir in peas, the 1/3 cup flour, and tarragon. Add chicken broth all at once. Cook and stir over medium heat until thickened and bubbly.

Cover and keep warm while preparing cobbler topping. For cobbler topping, in a medium mixing bowl stir together the 2 cups flour, shredded carrot, sugar, baking powder, and 1/2 tsp. salt. Stir in pareve milk or broth and the remaining 2 tablespoons oil until combined.

Place chicken back into the baking pan and pour warm sauce over the chicken. Spoon topping over sauce. Bake for 25 minutes or until topping is golden brown and a wooden toothpick inserted in the centre of topping comes out clean. (Makes 6 servings)

APPLE GLAZED BBQ CHICKEN

2 whole chickens
1 6-oz. can frozen apple juice concentrate, thawed
1/4 c packed brown sugar
1/4 c ketchup
1 tbl. cider vinegar
1 tsp. thyme
1 clove crushed garlic
2 green apples, cored, cut into wedges
2 onions, peeled, cut into wedges

Preheat oven to 325°. Spray a large roasting pan with cooking spray; lay chickens breast-side up. Combine remaining ingredients, except apples and onions. Brush half the sauce over chicken. Tuck onion and apple wedges around chicken. Bake, uncovered, 1 h., 15 min. Carefully turn chicken over; brush remaining sauce on chicken. Bake for an additional hour, or until golden brown and juices run clear.

The future of the Jewish community depends on programs and initiatives that nurture and strengthen Jewish identity in our youth. That is why UJA Federation places a strong emphasis on investing in Jewish education and identity programs. Over $12M annually is allocated towards Jewish day and supplementary education. Over 80% of these funds (in excess of $10M) support tuition subsidies, and we leverage three times this amount in tuition support from parents and philanthropists. We lead with the largest Birthright Israel contingent, per capita, in the world; the largest March of the Living delegation outside of Israel; diverse Jewish summer camps and youth groups; Hillel on university campuses; PJ Library and an array of other cultural programs with impact.

Palestinian refusal called 'basis of conflict'

JTA

TEL AVIV — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu asserted in a major address Sunday that the primary obstacle to Middle East peace is the Palestinian refusal to recognize Israel as a Jewish state.

Netanyahu made the remark at Bar-Ilan University, his first address there since a 2009 speech in which he famously declared his support for a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Now, as Israeli-Palestinian negotiations have resumed for the first time in three years, Netanyahu declared that Palestinian leadership, not Israel, deserved primary blame for the conflict.

He began his speech discussing nearly 4,000 years of Jewish history in the Land of Israel and later said that Palestinian refugees should not be allowed a right of return to Israel.

"The basis of the conflict has been the same for 90 years: refusal to recognize the right of the Jews to a state in Israel," Netanyahu said. "For the process we're in to have a real chance of success, we need to hear finally from the leadership of the Palestinians that they recognize the Jewish state, which is Israel."

Netanyahu did not elaborate on a future Palestinian-Israeli border or the future status of Jerusalem, instead focusing on a retelling of the conflict's history. He listed a string of Palestinian attacks on Jews that occurred before Israel's occupation of the West Bank began in 1967. The prime minister also spoke at length about former Palestinian mufti Haj Amin al-Husseini's ties to Adolf Hitler.

"The Zionists didn't use the Holocaust to destroy the national aspirations of the Palestinians," Netanyahu said. "The Palestinian leadership used the Holocaust to destroy the Zionist movement, and almost succeeded."

The speech came five days after Netanyahu addressed the UN General Assembly, when he spent most of his time emphasizing the dangers of Iran's alleged nuclear weapons program.

Values charter part of 'inclusive nationalism'

Elias Levy
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The proposed Quebec charter of values is "temperate and reasonable" and in keeping with the Parti Québécois' "inclusive nationalism," says the minister responsible for promoting the legislation.

The criticism that the proposed charter is exclusionist and discriminatory against Quebec's religious minorities is "unjust and unfounded," Bernard Drainville, the provincial minister of democratic institutions and citizenship participation told The CJN in a French-language interview.

Bernard Drainville defends proposal to The CJN

The charter is "based on the fundamental principle that all those who live in Quebec are Quebecers, no matter what their origin, their religion or the colour of their skin," Drainville said.

"We are all Quebecers. The nationalism vigorously defended by the Parti Québécois is inclusive and open to differences... and totally opposite to the divisive nationalism described by the critics. The charter of values... is an extension of the inclusive nationalism to which the Parti Québécois has subscribed for a very long time."

As for criticism from English Canadians outside Quebec, Drainville said he'd like to remind them of a major historical fact they may have forgotten.

"In 1832, the parliament of Lower Canada was the first of any government in the British Empire to recognize, for the first time, the civil rights of the Jewish community. The parliament consisting mainly of French-Canadians – as they were then called – allowed Ezekiel Hart, a man of Jewish origin elected in Trois-Rivières to sit in the legislative assembly...

Asper Way Proposed

WINNIPEG — Winnipeg's downtown development committee is backing a bid to rename a 450-metre stretch of Waterfront Drive where the new Canadian Museum for Human Rights is located in honour of Israel Asper. The museum, set to open next year, was the brainchild of the late media mogul. Israel Asper Way, in the city's Forks area, was proposed by city councillors Jenny Gerbasi and Jeff Browaty. It contravenes a 2011 bylaw restricting street name changes to honorary designations, to avoid confusion for businesses and emergency services, but the councillors say the change is appropriate and disruption would be minimal, the Winnipeg Free Press reported. City council must OK the idea.

Book On GG Shortlist

TORONTO — Toronto writer Kenneth Bonert's debut novel The Lion Seeker made the short list for a $25,000 Governor General's Literary Award last week. The South African-born Bonert, 41, was among four other finalists. His book is about a young Jewish man who immigrates to Johannesburg from Lithuania prior to World War II. It's partly inspired by stories his grandmother told him in Yiddish about her childhood in Lithuania, he told Canadian Press. The winner will be named Nov. 13.

Kelowna Gets Torah

KELOWNA, B.C. — Chabad Okanagan Synagogue had a new Torah scroll for Simchat Torah this year, thanks to a $40,000 gift from the owner of a local winery. Members of the two-year-old shul completed the scroll by writing letters in it with the help of a sofer from Israel during an event in a local park last month. Stephen Cipes, of Summerhill Pyramid Winery, donated the Torah, which is the first to be completed in the Okanagan.

Ex-PQ Premiers Slam Charter Proposal

MONTREAL — Two former Parti Québécois premiers sharply criticized the proposed charter of Quebec values last week.

Jacques Parizeau

The denunciation by hardliner Jacques Parizeau, who blamed "money and the ethnic vote" for the yes side's loss in the 1995 sovereignty referendum, was followed the next day by Lucien Bouchard.

Parizeau wrote in Le Journal de Montréal that the current PQ government is going too far in banning all provincial and municipal public servants from wearing religious garb on the job.

Parizeau, premier from 1994 to 1996, said prohibiting religious symbols for judges, prosecutors, police officers and prison guards is far enough. That was the 2008 recommendation of scholars Gérard Bouchard and Charles Taylor, co-chairs of the Liberal-appointed commission into reasonable accommodation.

He agrees with the former Charest government's bill that faces must be uncovered to deliver or receive public services. Bill 94 died on the order paper.

The next day Bouchard, premier from 1996 to 2001, agreed only public employees in positions of authority shouldn't be allowed to wear religious symbols.

Prayers Protested

JERUSALEM — More than 100 women attended a Women of the Wall Rosh Chodesh service Oct. 4 at the Kotel and faced raucous protests from haredi seminary girls. The students were bused in ostensibly to pray for the health of Shas leader Rabbi Ovadia Yosef. The monthly event was held in the women's section for the first time since last spring. A court ruling this year allowed the group to pray without fear of arrest. The prime minister has also set up a committee to forge a compromise between the group and haredim who control the site.

Creating the world's most valuable poker chip

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

All that glitters is not only gold. There are also diamonds, emeralds, sapphires, rubies, pink diamonds – even solid silver looks pretty good in the right setting.

Tastefully combine these elements, pile on the carats, give them a casino motif, and voila, you have a line of merchandise that even the Sultan of Brunei would find appealing.

One piece in particular in Gerald Lewy's collection is noteworthy for its value. It's a hand-made "casino disk," known more commonly as a poker chip, made of 22-karat pink gold, framed by 5.13 carats of pink diamonds, with a rim consisting of 17 one-carat diamonds, bearing on one side a diamond-encrusted lucky seven and, on the other, a lucky eight made of 62 small round diamonds. The numbers alone weigh in at 2.5 carats.

The disk – really a work of art – was appraised with a value of $450,000 – leading Guinness World Records to designate it the most valuable casino chip in the world.

Costing more than a house in many parts of Canada, it's no wonder there have never been chips worth that much. Lewy, its designer/creator, proudly displays the certificate attesting to his entry into the rarified realm of world records.

The disk, he said, is the culmination of 2-1/2 years work and is the centrepiece of a line of glitzy jewelry and tchatchkes that he'll soon market to those inhabiting a world of luxury most of us can only dream of.

Though it's appraised at nearly half a million dollars, the chip can be had for much less, more like $275,000. The appraised value for insurance purposes doesn't exactly match its market value, Lewy said.

Still, it's the higher price that the Guinness people relied upon, and Lewy isn't complaining, especially considering all the time, effort and expertise that went into its creation.

Lewy has been a diamond setter for 53 years. His father, Maurice, had been in the diamond business in London, England, supplying the British government with industrial diamonds. He was also in the jewelry business, manufacturing and wholesaling product that showed up in the city's prestigious Hatton Garden, the centre of London's jewelry trade.

Most news media not charmed by new Iranian president

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

A great deal has been said over the last couple of weeks about the tremendous impact that Iranian President Hassan Rouhani's "charm offensive" has had on shifting western opinion about Iran in a more positive direction. After all, he managed most skillfully to present a new, moderate face of Iran to the international community, in particular regarding Iran's commitment never to acquire nuclear weapons – while, nonetheless, insisting that his country retains the right to enrich nuclear fuel.

Some western journalists and pundits, such as Tony Burman in his Toronto Star column late last month, were indeed impressed by Iran's peaceful declarations, but a great many others, even some who have encouraged exploring a renewed diplomatic track in order to test Iran's intentions, remained skeptical.

The Sept. 28 Economist editorial, "Curb your enthusiasm," argued: "No matter how friendly Iran suddenly appears, any talks will be protracted and theatrical. Mr. Rouhani certainly had a successful first night [at the UN], thrilling his audience with displays of humility… However, the Iranian who would approve any deal is not Mr. Rouhani, but his boss, the country's supreme leader, Ali Khamenei, whose antipathy towards America goes back to the American- and British-sponsored coup in 1953 that deposed Iran's first elected leader. And given Iran's long history of evasiveness on the nuclear issue, the suspicion is that it is merely buying time for its centrifuges. Looming in the background is the precedent of North Korea, which agreed on a disarmament deal with America in 2005, then reneged on it and has now become a nuclear power."

In his Sept. 29 Foreign Policy column, Aaron David Miller agreed about Khamenei, saying that, given his "withholding nature," the "Supreme Leader may actually see benefits in keeping the U.S.-Iranian relationship in a kind of managed tension." Miller argued that the "tough and wily Iranian regime [is] close to crossing the nuclear threshold, but is probing to see whether it can get sanctions relief without giving up all of its nuclear gains. Indeed, it's far from certain that despite the pain of sanctions, the Supreme Leader is in any hurry to drop the program's military aspects without major concessions from the United States."

Others have pointed out that for all his soft talk, Rouhani shares Khamenei's attitudes about Iran's nuclear ambitions. Charles Krauthammer, for instance, in a Sept. 28 National Post column, noted that "[a]s Iran's chief nuclear negotiator between 2003 and 2005, [Rouhani] boasted in a 2004 speech to the Supreme Cultural Revolution Council, 'While we were talking with the Europeans in Tehran, we were installing equipment in parts of the [uranium conversion] facility in Isfahan… In fact, by creating a calm environment, we were able to complete the work in Isfahan.'"

Likewise Jeffery Goldberg in his Sept. 30 Bloomberg column: "Until proven otherwise, there's no reason to think that Rouhani, who is acting on Khamenei's behalf, is ready to shut down his country's nuclear program, despite airy statements to the contrary. The Iranian leadership wants to maintain its ability to produce nuclear weapons while at the same time convincing the West to lift sanctions. So far, Rouhani's difference is one of style, not of substance."

In its Sept. 26 editorial "Sober but dangerous," the Globe and Mail took a realistic view of Rouhani's rhetoric at the UN, noting that, while he affirmed Iran's right to enrich uranium, "he did not specifically insist on the making of high-grade enriched uranium, which can be readily turned into weapons-grade uranium." That position needs to be tested this month during nuclear negotiations in Geneva, negotiations that the Globe views, in intriguingly qualified terms, as "not yet doomed to futility."

The Globe concludes on both a somber and sobering note. It expressed skepticism about Khamenei's 2012 fatwa against nuclear weapons, cautioning that "if the rulers of Iran chose to believe themselves in great danger, they would doubtless try to be in a position to make such weapons in a hurry, claiming necessity. It is such a situation that the world needs to prevent."

When my husband died suddenly, my whole world stopped. I didn't even know where to begin with the arrangements. It was 2am. I called Benjamin's. To my surprise, Michael Benjamin himself answered the phone. They took care of every imaginable detail. They even had umbrellas for guests when it rained at the gravesite. I will never forget their wonderful care.

"They thought of everything."

The Jewish kippah problem

Guest Editorial

Quebec has a kippah problem. A proposed "charter of values" will prohibit public employees from wearing hijabs, turbans, kippahs, and bizarrely oversized crosses. Apparently, the government believes that religious symbols worn by less than one per cent of the population threaten to turn Quebec into a theocracy.

The Jewish community has united in opposition to the proposal. This threat to minority religious rights is unsettling, and Jews of all backgrounds feel a sentimental tie to the beleaguered kippah.

But as Jews, we have our own kippah problem. Our attitudes toward the kippah reflect our ambivalence about being a Jew in the non-Jewish world.

After the Jews were given political rights in Europe, many chose the route of partial assimilation. Their motto was "be a Jew at home, and a mensch in the street." In their desire for acceptance, Jews modified their public image.

The tradition of wearing the kippah was quickly tossed away. At the turn of the century, the kippah was discouraged by the Reform movement as an ancient relic. One historian remarked that "worship with an uncovered head" was a "hallmark of Reform Judaism".

Other Jews saw integration as dangerous. They followed an ideology of "shalem," of being distinct. They spoke Yiddish, wore a shtreimel and used their Hebrew names on official documents. These Jews insisted on being part of a counterculture and defiantly refused to integrate.

Most Jews fall between the poles of ghettoization and assimilation. We know how to fit into the larger culture, yet still want to be profoundly Jewish as well. And so we wonder: how different should we be?

And that's the Jewish kippah problem. We want to be serious Jews, but we also don't want to stick out that much. It's a simple psychological fact: people want to fit in with the majority.

Even Orthodox Jews are sometimes uncomfortable wearing a kippah. It's not uncommon that when I'm in remote venues with few Jews, I'll meet a modern Orthodox friend who's chosen to wear a baseball cap instead of a kippah, so that his head covering is less conspicuous.

This kippah problem is our greatest challenge: how to be comfortable while being different. A new Pew study shows that 32 per cent of American Jews have a Christmas tree. Christmas is ubiquitous. To resist it is difficult, because it's difficult to swim against the stream. To put it directly, kippahs are awkward while Christmas trees are comfortable. That's our kippah problem.

I wish I had a magic solution, but I don't. Being a Jew in North America means having the courage of your convictions and proudly being different. That's not so simple, even for a rabbi.

Recently, I was on a CBC panel debating the charter of values. I left just before sundown, at the last moments for the afternoon prayer. The vigorous debate left me feeling a bit leery of public displays of religion, and I wondered whether I should pray covertly while sitting in my car. I sat for a moment in my car, then reconsidered. I then stood outside in the parking lot and prayed. Those moments of prayer inspired me to realize that yes, you can be both a mensch and a Jew, both in the street and at home.

Story should have focused on tower

I was glad to read about the tower dedication in memory of my son Jacob Hertzman ("Holy Blossom tower dedicated in memory of late teen" The CJN, Sept. 25).

Jacob loved Holy Blossom, and the temple community responded in kind.

Had your reporter contacted me, I could have told her what a welcoming shul we belong to, how the clergy and religious school enabled Jacob to participate there, that we have a Project Tikvah Fund to benefit other children with special needs, and that Jacob and I were among the original cohort for Shabbat family services.

I would have described the Sept. 7 Shabbat of Dedication, when I had the privilege of chanting Torah, Jacob's brother Ben chanted Haftorah, and friends and family were called to the bimah for aliyot.

The part about Rabbi John Moscowitz's departure was unnecessary and irrelevant, citing an incendiary, disparaging article previously published in another newspaper.

Better to have maintained the reverent tone and direction that began this piece, thereby honouring my son's life and Holy Blossom Temple.

Like an old friend

What a shock I had to find The CJN at someone's house last week. I lamented its demise last spring, when I was told by a CJN employee to get a refund for my subscription since you were shutting down. I have since been out of the proverbial Jewish Toronto loop. I missed knowing what is going on in Toronto, Canada, Israel and the world from the Jewish perspective.

When I sat down to read the paper, it was like a visit from an old friend. I enjoyed finding out that my old haunt, the Holy Blossom Tower, is being dedicated to my favourite student, Jacob Hertzman. I learned of the Jewish-Israel perspective on the Kenyan situation, I read commentaries by my favourite columnists and I was updated by several very special stories, such as Gilad Schalit's recent visit to Toronto. I wonder how many others don't know that The CJN continues to be. Please renew my subscription.

Edmonton school better than OK

Karen Skinazi and parents like her are impressive in their persistence and diligence in finding appropriate Jewish day schools for their children ("Our Jewish day school closed – just before the new year" The CJN, Sept. 12). However, I was disappointed by the opening lines of her article regarding the Edmonton Talmud Torah: "The school was fine – neither spectacular nor terrible. I sent him there because, frankly, it was the only Jewish game in town."

This attitude does a disservice to the incredible foresight of the leaders, administrators and parents of the Edmonton Jewish community. Our Talmud Torah is now the oldest continuously operating Jewish day school in all of Canada. In May 2012, a community-wide celebration was held to mark its 100th anniversary.

Skinazi should have been thrilled that, while living in "Canada's oilpatch" in northern Alberta, a quality Jewish day school education was available to her children, thanks to the long-term commitment and dedication of this relatively small, but vibrant and welcoming Jewish community.

Who does CIJA speak for?

More pontification from Shimon Fogel in today's CJN ("We can't have it both ways" The CJN, Oct. 3)? Is he the new editor of The CJN? He uses lots of big words that one needs to look up in a dictionary to understand. And the point? Be nice to those who aren't so nice to the Jewish community and Israel? Be nice to those politicians who are documented supporters of Islamic Society of North America and other groups deemed terrorist by the government of Canada? Sha shtil is his message. After all, that works, doesn't it?

Who elected him and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs to speak for the community? Nobody! So how about a more balanced perspective for the rest of us – and let's hear some facts, not hyperbole.

Netanyahu may have little choice but to wait

David Horovitz
The Times of Israel

You're wrong, I'll be vindicated, but I know I can't stop you trying.

Stranger things have happened. I'm not a fool, and you're damn right you can't stop me trying.

That was the blunt, unspoken essence of the gracious display staged by U.S. President Barack Obama and his guest, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu at the White House on Sept. 30, showcasing a mature but asymmetrical partnership – between a superpower and, however unpalatable for Israel, a supplicant.

The prime minister "is always candid," Obama vouchsafed just a little wryly at the tail end of his remarks. And one can imagine that Netanyahu was candid indeed behind closed doors, marshalling compelling argument, and evidence, to underpin his public contention that Iran "is committed to Israel's destruction."

But ultimately, Netanyahu knew all along that he and Obama would have to agree to disagree, that the president would not be deterred from putting the diplomatic route to the "test," and that attempting a repeat of his May 2011 Oval Office lecture style (when he told Obama bitterly that Israel's pre-1967 lines are indefensible) could only be counter-productive. He is certain there is no diplomatic route, only a blind alley, but he held his tongue.

And so Obama – much more familiar with Netanyahu's thinking, and with Israel's nuances, after his visit in March – could afford to be magnanimous.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and U.S. President Barack Obama hold a meeting in the Oval Office Sept. 30. (Kobi Gideon/GPO/Flash90 photo)

Thus the president promised that economic pressure on Iran would not be lifted lightly, assuring his visitor airily that "anything that we do will require the highest standards of verification in order for us to provide the sort of sanctions relief that I think they are looking for." And importantly for Netanyahu, he declared that "we take no options off the table, including military options, in terms of making sure that we do not have nuclear weapons in Iran" – a threat he had chosen not to issue in the specific Iranian context during his address to the United Nations General Assembly last week.

There are those who might see in Obama's restating of the military option, and his apparent tough line on sanctions, a victory of sorts for Netanyahu. But in truth, anything less would have been a stinging public rejection of Israel's assessments and orientation.

Netanyahu has no time for Iranian President Hassan Rouhani's we're-no-threat-to-anyone platitudes. He's certain that Tehran is fooling the international community and that the regime is duplicitously seeking to attain and retain nuclear breakout status – with the means and the material to make a dash for the bomb when it so chooses. That must not be allowed to happen, and so for Netanyahu, as he put it on Sept. 30, "the bottom line, again, is that Iran fully dismantles its military nuclear program."

Yet for Obama, now at least, there's a modicum of doubt, and a readiness to consider that Iran might just be changing for real. Or Obama is showing a readiness, at least, to play out the diplomatic track.

In what he considers the certain event that Iran proves obdurate and unforthcoming, Netanyahu would like the United States to intervene militarily, or failing that, to back Israel in doing so.

But the Israeli option has plainly receded for the time being, since the prime minister can hardly contemplate military action so long as the president is – however frustratingly, even infuriatingly for Netanyahu – engaging with Iran and giving peace a chance. Former Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin's Israel defied and surprised the United States in striking then-Iraqi president Saddam Hussein's reactor at Osirak in 1981, but it wasn't the resounding slap in the face that independent Israel action against Iran would be today. Then-U.S. president Ronald Reagan wasn't personally invested in trying to resolve the crisis through negotiations at the time.

If, as Netanyahu has always contended, the Iranians are buying time, he has little choice now but to hold his fire and wait things out. In eschewing the bitter public lecture style on Sept. 30, Netanyahu seemed to be acknowledging as much.

Canadian Jews must champion freedom agenda

Gil Troy
in Montreal

The many liberties that make North America history's greatest experiment in mass democracy and freedom should not be taken for granted. Our comfortable lives in the United States and Canada often spawn a dangerous complacency. Canadian Jews in particular must be vigilant about championing the freedom agenda, especially with the ugly authoritarianism overtaking Quebec

Of course, this isn't a specifically Jewish issue. This is an all-Canada issue and a broader human rights issue. But therein lies its power. American Jews, in particular, have been extremely effective in advancing all-American issues that benefit American Jews. This alliance of altruism and interest has historically been best expressed in the American Jewish alliance with the Democratic Party and liberalism itself.

As refugees from eastern Europe (mostly), American Jews were traumatized by czarist oppression. In fighting for human rights, they were fighting for Jewish rights – and it worked, facilitating Jewish communal growth and individual Jewish prosperity. Especially after president Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal brought Jews into his Democratic Party coalition of the "Forgotten Man," American Jews became so devoted to progressive ideals, they often confused Judaism and liberalism. Many now seem more committed to liberalism than Judaism itself.

Today, the situation is touchier. Most American Jews are so integrated, assimilated and acculturated that they lack the insecurity or recent memory of oppression that motivated their parents or grandparents. But, most dismaying, liberalism itself has changed. The 1960s spawned an identity politics that often sacrifices true liberalism's universal ideals to protect certain groups – and Jews these days are rarely considered one of the groups.

The civil war within the left can be illustrated by looking at the proposed charter of Quebec values. Once upon a time, such an affront to freedom and diversity, squelching free religious expression for anyone on a government payroll, would offend everyone on the left. And it certainly is offensive to traditional liberals who believe in universal freedoms and erring on the side of liberty. But there are those today on the radical, politically correct left, in Canada and elsewhere, who would salute this charter as a necessary bulwark against organized religion and as a form of collective affirmative action, using government to protect Quebec values. Identity politics, in America, Canada, and elsewhere, championing those deemed oppressed even over core ideals, encourages a PC view that ignores Palestinian terrorism and Israeli democracy to condemn Israel and Zionism.

While Canadian Jews also tended to be pro-rights and left-leaning, the dynamic north of the border was and is different. One reason why Canadian Jews now must mobilize is because Canadian ideology views the whole questions of rights differently than most Americans do. Canada is more collectivist. Canadian rights are granted to Canadians by the government and are not inherent as they are to Americans. That's why a provincial legislature can pass legislation overriding core freedoms, "notwithstanding" the rights granted in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Americans find language laws, language police and restrictions on what religious people wear unfathomable, because they believe their rights belong to them and aren't issued by the government. All Canadians, but particularly Canadian Jews, should hop aboard that freedom train and trigger a broader debate in Canada about what liberty in this extraordinary democracy is all about.

The charter of Quebec values debacle proves this debate's importance. Even if the charter, imposed by a minority government of mediocrities, fails, the damage has been done. Quebec has become a laughingstock among the world's democracies, which is an unfortunate PR blow.

Even more important, such proposals have a chilling effect, even if they fail. The fact that any kippah-wearer, or hijab-wearer or turban-wearer in Quebec today has felt diminished, inhibited, threatened, or even outraged by the legislation is an imposition on them and their community. It's simply immoral, in a diverse, multicultural democracy, for such proposals to be advanced by the rulers in charge. Note that Israel, which is pilloried in the international community for all sorts of alleged offences, has no such legislation against its Muslim citizens – and, as far as I know, has never contemplated it.

This issue is not only one of self-interest, it's a core value. The Torah itself urges us to "proclaim liberty throughout the land." We understand that proclaiming sometimes isn't enough. You have to fight for your rights, too.

Appreciating Israel

Urban Writer
Avrum Rosensweig

The State of Israel sits among countries that are hostile toward her. It's a hot country with desert winds, and a cold country with snowy, blustering gusts. The Jews who have settled her arrived on her shores from more than two dozen countries around the world, from as far away as Siberia to the north and Argentina to the south.

Only recently did its population, Jew and Arab, hit eight million. Israel is one of the smallest countries in the world. Yet, she has a greater number of startup businesses than all the European Union countries combined. Her $100-billion-plus economy is greater than that of all of her immediate neighbours combined. Israelis invented the cellphone and voice mail. Her crisis response is respected around the world. Her ability to create seems endless and her title of "light unto the nations" is appropriate and shining brightly.

I write this article as a reminder to all people, especially young ones, that we should never, ever, take Eretz Yisrael for granted, and forever be aware of her importance. My fear, however, is that over time, her prominence in the eyes of many is shrinking. This dynamic scares me.

Why do I say this? I am exposed to many young people in the Toronto Jewish community. I talk with them and frequently steer the conversation toward Israel, emphasizing its significance in our lives as Jews.

Many teens and young adults will tell me that they are focused on developing their lives, making money, their education and enjoyment. When I ask them about Israel, their knowledge of it, and their feelings and thoughts about it, too many times their faces go blank.

This is a challenge to our community and all of the Diaspora.

The obvious solution is hasbarah (explanation) within our own ranks. Wherever and whenever we can, teachers in our day schools and talmud torahs should be explaining Israel in greater depth, with an emphasis on her successes, understanding that our Israel is responsible for medical findings that are saving millions of men, women and children all over the world.

However, I suggest that our educators, leaders and parents also need to educate themselves more on the history of Israel, with a focus on her history, aliyah and the sacrifices Israelis have made on behalf of Jewish people and non-Jews everywhere.

By this I mean it should be clear to all of our children that Israel's survival has been and is predicated on neighbourhood bravery and valour. Our progenies need to take a virtual walk through any neighbourhood in places like Jerusalem, Chazor and Sderot, and knock on doors and ask a simple question: "Who in this household has been in the army, fought in a war, lost their lives or been injured?"

The questioning can dig deeper. Let them ask: "When did you come to Israel? From what country? What was your reason for coming here, and what hardships have you faced?"

Let them listen, and hear the stories of Ethiopian Jews who barely made it onto the plane to escape guerilla fighters about to attack Addis Ababa. Let them hear the history of the Holocaust survivor who arrived in Israel from a displaced persons camp and was immediately handed an M1 to go out and fight in a war imposed upon the infant state.

These are worthwhile histories to listen to, as they address some fundamental tenets within Judaism, including, appreciation for what others have done for all of us and the courage to fight when called upon. Our young people, just like us, need to be reminded that 18- and 19-year-olds have lost their lives in protection of our Jewishness and our place in the world.

They must embrace this reality and hold it dearly within their hearts and minds. They must understand that the Jewish People's relative comfort in the world today is predicated on it, and that the Israel has been able to grow, prosper and help the rest of the world, because of these young people who were prepared to fight our enemies, and die.

Jews – know the gift we have in the State of Israel. Young people – be aware that your Israeli counterparts have played a significant role in your life. For this, you need to be thankful.

Volunteers seek a Torah for Shabbat services

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

Joe Black, 87, has always had a mission in life – to help others. And now he is asking for help himself.

For more than 20 years, Black and other volunteers have conducted Shabbat services in English and Hebrew for the residents of two Toronto-area retirement homes, Cummer Lodge and Valley View Residence, alternating between the two.

Black told The CJN that Cummer Lodge has a Torah, but the volunteers need a Torah for Valley View Residence.

"The residents get a great deal of joy when we conduct the services, as many are in wheelchairs. They light up when we carry the Torah around to them and they can touch it and kiss it."

Sabbath services for the residents at Cummer Lodge are led by a volunteer. [Papa Jo photo]

Black, now a "sort of retired" photographer, was well-known for generations at Graphic Artists.

He was the official photographer for the National Hockey League, Canadian Football League and many corporate and private events. He lectures at the Bernard Betel Centre, has a very large library of Jewish films and still does photography.

Over the years, Black said, the group has had Torahs on loan, adding: "Many years ago, we purchased one Torah from California for the Cummer Lodge. At that time, the volunteers were capable of having a fundraising event. We are too old now to organize such an event to purchase another Torah."

He said the volunteers would like to have one donated or loaned to Valley View Residence, and he hopes there is a Torah somewhere that's not being used.

"Along with our Shabbat services," he said, "we have a sing-along after the service and a 90-year-old lady plays the piano. The residents love the Yiddish, freilech music."

But having a Torah could make it even more enjoyable for the participants at Valley View Residence.

"There may even be a Torah that is not kosher, which we could use, since the service is not read from the Torah."

Black and his son Martin built an Aron Kodesh for both Cummer Lodge and Valley View Residence.

If you have or know of an extra Torah that is not being used, please contact Joe Black at 647-342-5929.

Senior's creative aspirations are a labour of love

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Rae Tobias has been sculpting with clay for 40 years, and the 92-year-old shows no signs of slowing down.

"I always did something with the arts –oils, painting, design, quilting," Tobias says. "After my youngest daughter went to university, I felt it was time for me to try something new. Clay is something I have always wanted to try, so I took a two-year program at George Brown College. From college, I went right to the Koffler Centre of the Arts' ceramics program and I'm still a student there."

Tobias' husband, Albert, died eight years ago. The matriarch of a large Jewish family, she has three daughters, 13 grandchildren and 10 great-grandchildren.

Creating decorative and sculptural pieces with hand-making techniques, including working with the wheel, Tobias proudly showcases her handiwork displayed throughout her home.

"My eyesight is not what it once was. I have macular degeneration, but I somehow manage. My fingers have picked up the touch," Tobias said.

A large part of her studio time is dedicated to filling many orders from her loved ones.

"My most recent request was from my seven-year-old great-grandson, Spencer Mozeg, who said, 'I'd like a mirror, Bubbie,' so I thought, 'I have to create something that appeals to him.' With his love of hockey, I designed a hockey player mirror with the Number 99 of Wayne Gretzky. The red hair peeking out represents Spencer, since he has red hair. I extended the ears a little bit, for the fun of it."

Tobias said he loved it so much he put in another order. "'Bubbie, will you make me a house?" he asked – then added, 'And, Bubbie, I want people in the house.'

'To that I answered, "What's a house without people?"'

Rae Tobias holds the hockey player mirror she made for her great-grandson.

Michelle Mendlowitz, Tobias' instructor at Koffler, says that despite being the oldest person in the room, she's often the most productive.

"Rae has the ability to motivate everyone around her. She is always ready to share her knowledge with classmates."

Koffler offers classes in ceramics, visual art, painting, photography, drawing, studio, and more, with programming at the Prosserman JCC on the Sherman Campus and at the Schwartz/Reisman Centre on Lebovic Campus in Vaughan.

"The love of creativity motivates me, as well as my being active in the community," Tobias adds.

"I play mah-jong weekly with the ladies. In fact, I was inspired to design a sculptural piece of our group."

Tobias confidently showed The CJN her sculpture.

"I have designed pieces on commission, but usually I don't. I do this as a hobby. It's a labour of love. I have no plans to retire anytime soon. I'll go to the end," Tobias says.

Jewish veterans dedicate two monuments

Jordan Adler
Special to The CJN

Two hundred and two Canadian Jewish soldiers who fought valiantly for their country during World War I now have two monuments in honour of their courage at Mount Sinai Memorial Park in Toronto.

In a special remembrance ceremony on Sunday, members of the Royal Canadian Legion General Wingate Branch No. 256 unveiled the two monuments that feature the names of Jewish soldiers who served Canada during that war.

General Wingate Branch No. 256 is the Jewish branch of the Royal Canadian Legion and is located in Toronto.

"It's a long road that has brought us to this proud moment," said Murray Jacobs, event chair and past president for General Wingate Branch No. 256.

"These young men put their country before themselves and laid down their lives for Canada and freedom."

The list of soldiers came from Oscar Adler, a branch board member. Seven years ago, Adler presented the findings of a research project, where he found that the names and statuses of 201 Jewish men and one Jewish woman who served in Canada's armed forces in World War I.

"I looked at some of the research. Some of them were 15 or 16 years of age," Harold Davis, a branch vice-president, told The CJN.

Moe Polansky, left, and Harold Davis, right, third vice-president for General Wingate Branch No. 256, unveiled two monuments commemorating 202 Canadian Jewish heroes who fought during World War I. Jack Jackson played the pipes.

"They just joined up and they came from right across Canada – little towns in Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario."

The monuments stand next to a cenotaph memorial the branch dedicated to Jewish veterans who fought in the two world wars and Korea and were buried overseas.

Julian Fantino, federal minister of veterans affairs, was present for the unveiling, which drew dozens of veterans and their families, even in rainy weather. Fantino compared the honoured soldiers to heroes in Jewish history, from Judah Maccabee to the fighters of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising.

"The place of the Jewish community in Canada is immoveable," Fantino said. "The wisdom, culture and service of the Jewish people have made Canada and indeed the world a far richer and better place."

Joe Oliver, federal minister of natural resources, and Norm Kelly, deputy mayor of Toronto, were also present at the ceremony. Kelly presented to General Wingate Branch No. 256 a letter from Mayor Rob Ford, who could not attend because he was away on city business.

"They are our heroes," Ford wrote in the letter. "We thank them and their families for their selfless and unwavering support to defending freedom's frontier."

As the war's 100th anniversary approaches, the two monuments are the only specific memorials that list the names of Canadian Jewish veterans who served during World War I.

Jacobs, a veteran of World War I who landed in Normandy just four days after D-Day, told The CJN that, historically, there has been little recognition for Canadian Jewish veterans.

Thirty-eight per cent of all Jewish males living in Canada during World War I served in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces.

Students look to the past for Learnathon

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The students at Eitz Chaim Day School in Toronto will keep a decades-long tradition alive as they prepare for a fundraising initiative called the Learnathon.

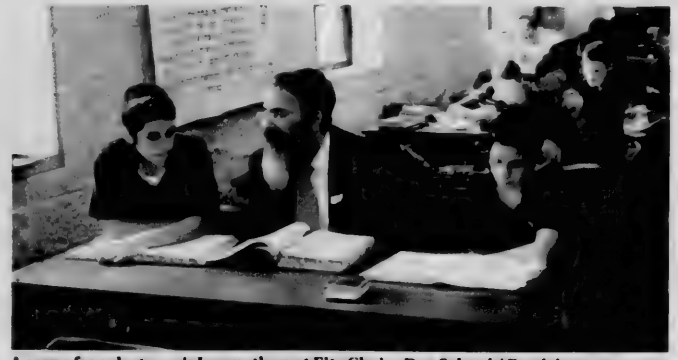
"This year, we're going to be raising money for UJA [Federation of Greater Toronto], and we're doing it in memory of children who were killed in the Holocaust," said Rabbi Isser Pliner, dean of Eitz Chaim Schools.

Rabbi Pliner explained that on Oct. 24, students will begin canvassing the community to be sponsored for a learning marathon that will be held Nov. 12 at the schools.

"The Learnathon that Eitz Chaim runs has probably been going on for more than 30 years. It was really Eitz Chaim's response to the UJA Walkathon. Since Eitz Chaim has school on Sunday [when the walkathon is held], our administration suggested that we would have the kids learn instead," he said.

About 400 students from grades 5 to 8 at all three campuses are participating in this initiative.

The Holocaust theme was chosen this year to try to make the project more meaningful to the students, Rabbi Pliner said.



A scene from last year's Learnathon at Eitz Chaim Day Schools' Patricia campus

"The program has kind of dwindled over the years, and I think what has been lacking was perhaps a lack of relevance," he said.

"UJA should be very relevant, and we try our best to promote them as much as we can, but it's hard to get excited about an organization. So you need to get the kids excited about something. If there is a tragedy that is happening in the world, the kids can come out and raise money for it."

Last year, the children raised funds in support of the victims of Hurricane Sandy, and in 2006, students collected donations for United Hazalah of Israel, an independent, volunteer emergency medical services organization.

"They had to replace a lot of their equipment following the 2006 Lebanon incursion, and we were able to rally around raising money to buy things that were necessary," Rabbi Pliner recalled.

He said this year, to honour the child victims of the Holocaust, each student will receive a short biography of a child who was killed.

"The students will learn a little about a child, but they will also be learning about different aspects of the Holocaust and aspects of the Torah and Tanach that are associated with events like the Holocaust," the rabbi said.

"We have names of those children, and we're going to use them as our focus. It's important to give kids focus."

The Learnathon will also feature guest educators. Rabbi Shmuel Klein, the director of publications and the head of the Holocaust studies program at Torah Umesorah, an organization that promotes Torah-based education, will be coming from New York to address the students.

"He used to be one of the principals here at Eitz Chaim and a teacher... When he was here, he was very instrumental in developing our whole Holocaust programing," he said.

"We hope he'll charge up the crowd in educating the kids."

Grant helps expand special needs program

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

For Robin Quint, Camp Ramah's Tikvah program for teens and young adults with special needs is a huge help.

When her 23-year-old daughter, Terri, is away at Ramah, Quint can rest easy knowing that not only is she making friends and enjoying summer camp activities, she's also gaining skills to help her in her life outside camp.

"Letters are written and I can see someone has helped her. She can read and understand what I've written," Quint said. "There's also an emphasis on her showering herself and lots of other life skills."

Terri Quint

This year, thanks to a $50,000 grant to the Ramah network of camps from the Ruderman Family Foundation – $10,000 of which went to the Canadian camp – Ramah was able to expand the Tikvah program, employing a dedicated head of its vocational program.

The Utterson, Ont., camp brought Tikvah participants to the nearby town of Bracebridge, where they could volunteer with seniors at a retirement home and at a local YMCA.

At the camp, they worked in the laundry facility and guest housing, giving them an opportunity to develop skills they can use outside camp.

The heads of the Tikvah program, Casey and Adam Green, work with the vocational education participants to identify strengths and interests, so that they can tailor a program to each camper's needs.

Casey Green said one of the biggest benefits for participants is the socialization experience, giving them an opportunity to experience life outside the sheltered camp community.

"If you're helping out a camp and everyone knows you, it's different from volunteering and having to understand social nuances," she said, explaining that at camp, it might be acceptable for the participants to be late for their volunteering jobs, but people might be less forgiving out in the wider community.

Terri Quint, who's been going to Ramah since she was a teenager, said she loves camp as a whole, but her favourite part of the Tikvah program is the work component. One of the skills she learned this year is how to do laundry.

Although Robin Quint said it's hard to pinpoint what others skills her daughter picked up at camp versus at the other programs for young adults with special needs that she attends regularly, she said she's noticed a change.

"She's done unbelievably well with the help from Ramah, without a question," she said. "I can only highly recommend that camp in the strongest possible way."

Sherri Wise was a victim of 1997 Jerusalem attack

Canadian terror victim sues Iran

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Sixteen years have passed since Sherri Wise was nearly killed in a horrific terrorist attack in Jerusalem, and thanks to the Justice for Victims of Terrorism Act that passed last year, Wise can finally seek damages from the Iranian government.

A claim filed in the British Columbia Supreme Court late last month by the 43-year-old Vancouver-based dentist is the first such case to be launched in Canada against Iran, a listed state sponsor of terrorism.

The lawsuit accuses the Islamic Republic of supplying Hamas with weapons, training and funds to facilitate terror attacks, including the 1997 attack in which Wise was severely injured.

"I was volunteering as a dentist for three weeks, working on underprivileged children in a program called Dental Volunteers for Israel," Wise said in an interview with The CJN.

In the six months before she arrived in Israel in August 1997, Israel had suffered three terrorist attacks: the Island of Peace massacre in March 1997 in which seven 11-year-old girls were killed; a suicide bombing in a Tel Aviv coffee shop that killed three and injured 49, and the Machane Yehuda bombing that killed 16 Israelis and wounded 178.

She said before she left for Israel, she thought, "'What are the odds of this happening? If it happens, do you think it's going to happen to you? No.'"

On the last day of her volunteer stint, she decided to go for lunch with a couple of friends at an outdoor café on Ben Yehuda Street, a trendy pedestrian mall.

"It was a gorgeous day, really hot out, and at one point, I saw this really strange-looking person walking down the street. It was a man dressed in women's clothing… he was in a skirt, in drag," she said, adding that she simply shrugged it off.

She then asked her friend to switch seats with her because she wanted to get out of the sun.

"Before I could even sit back down in her chair, the first two bombs went off. I was knocked to the floor and when I turned around to see what was happening, the other bomber was directly in front of me and he pulled the detonator."

Three Hamas suicide bombers were responsible for murdering five Israelis, including three 14-year-old girls, and wounding 190 more.

"I had burns on 40 per cent of my body.

Sherri Wise

I lost a lot of hearing, my hair was burned off and I had a bolt through my foot. I was stuck to the table, because all the nails [from the bomb] that went through the table went into my leg, so I was impaled on the table," she recalled.

She spent two weeks in an Israeli hospital, then flew to Winnipeg to stay with her parents for three months before returning to Vancouver.

She spent six months being treated at burn clinics, and because of swelling and sensitivity in her arms and hands, she wasn't able to return to work for nearly a year.

Her insurance policy, which "was void in the event of terrorism or war," would not cover her medical expenses. Neither would British Columbia's health insurance, which doesn't cover injuries sustained out of province.

Despite having to pay out of pocket for her recovery and her loss of income that resulted from being unable to work, she didn't consider pursuing legal action until she became involved with the Canadian Coalition Against Terror (C-CAT) in 2004.

C-CAT is the organization that led the campaign for the passage of the Justice for Victims of Terrorism Act (JVTA), which was enacted in March 2012, allowing Canadians to seek damages against Iran and Syria, which were designated as state sponsors of terror.

Although her claim doesn't seek a specific amount in damages from Iran, Wise and her lawyers are hoping for a share of Iran's millions of dollars in assets in Canada.

Last month, the Department of Foreign Affairs released a list of Iranian-owned properties in Ottawa, as well as 14 Canadian bank accounts holding at least $2.6 million in total.

Complicating things are three American cases against Iran that have been filed in Ontario. The Americans were awarded more than $300 million by U.S. courts, but because Iran didn't have assets in the United States, they asked the Ontario court to award them Iran's Canadian assets.

In a sworn statement presented at a Sept. 30 Ontario Superior Court of Justice hearing, Wise argued that she would be "severely prejudiced if I am not permitted to intervene and if the plaintiffs' motion is not adjourned so my lawyers have time to prepare submissions."

She added that, "it is unlikely that the defendants [Iran] will have any assets remaining if the plaintiffs are granted default judgment."

Wise's lawyer, Mark Freiman, explained to The CJN that the Justice for Victims of Terrorism Act "allows Canadian victims of terrorism to sue for acts of terrorism committed since 1985… There is another provision that says people who hold judgments from another country against a listed state sponsor of terrorism, with respect to acts of terrorism, can enforce those judgments in Canada," he said.

Freiman said that during the hearing, he "asked the judge to allow us to take part in the proceedings, because we believe there is an important issue that has to be decided about the act itself… The question is whether it also allows for foreign judgments stretching back that far to be enforced in Canada. We don't think that is the intention or the effect of the law."

The judge ultimately ruled that Wise didn't have a legal interest in that proceeding.

But Wise and her lawyers aren't giving up.

"We're in it for the long run and we will see it through and we will take every legal avenue to pursue it," Wise said.

NOVEMBER 14TH ISSUE

Residents oppose Bathurst Manor Plaza plan

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Bathurst Manor residents expressed their obvious displeasure with revised plans for the redevelopment of Bathurst Manor Plaza at a community consultation meeting held last week at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

In the third community meeting on the matter since 2006, lawyer Adam Brown, who was presenting the revised plans on behalf of the site's owners Kilbarry Holding Corp., had to speak over the shouts and rumblings of the more than 300 people who attended.

The revised application, which would shift the buildings away from single family homes located to the north of the site, includes 44 townhouse units, two condominium buildings with 350 residential units and retail space, all to be built in three phases. Parking would be available below and above ground.

He said the proposed plan includes living space for about 700 people, and the anticipated start date for Phase 1 is "unlikely before 2014." Each phase should take about 2-1/2 years.

The plaza, on the northeast corner of Wilmington Avenue and Overbrook Place, has been in decline since its anchor supermarket closed in 2004.

Brown, who had to rush through his presentation because people were impatiently waiting to ask questions, said retail patterns are changing and people are no longer turning to neighbourhood stores for their shopping needs.

"Plazas are going into decline. Putting in residential [housing will make the plaza] more viable," he said.

Despite Brown's assurances that the area has the "capacity to accommodate the development," residents said they worried about, among other things, increased traffic, drainage and sewage, overcrowding in local schools, and, as one resident expressed loudly, "turning our neighbourhood into a ghetto."

Brown said school overcrowding is not an issue, because new students will be bused to outside schools, since local schools are full.

One resident replied that this would add new buses to an already high-traffic area, while another woman, who identified herself as a local teacher, said she doesn't believe the Toronto District School Board has money for extra buses. "That means more children will be put into these schools. These are problems that are not being addressed."

James Pasternak, city councillor for Ward 10, which encompasses Bathurst Manor, assured the crowd that the meeting was solely informational and that nothing has been decided yet.

"We have to make sure your voices are heard," he said.

Cassidy Ritz, a senior planner for community planning with the city, said the municipality is taking this matter very seriously.

"Following this meeting, we will determine if the applicant should make further changes. The applicant will then make further changes, or proceed with the application."

Mark Adler, the MP for York Centre who said he was at the meeting as a resident and not in an official capacity, received no response when he asked who among the crowd supported the development.

"I don't know how it has gone this far. [Why] is city hall making the decisions instead of elected officials?" Adler asked during the question period.

"Tonight is a call to action, and we have to get [Mayor Rob Ford] involved. Let me know if you're prepared to fight to defeat the current configuration."

He invited residents to call him or drop into this office. "As a community, we will figure this out."

Pasternak said that if the applicant brings in a dramatically different plan, there will be another community meeting to consider it.

"I have vigorously opposed this plan for many years and will continue to do so," Pasternak told The CJN.

"The density and the unit configurations are totally inappropriate for this site. It does not reflect the character of the neighbourhood, the wishes of the community and the overall historical role of the plaza as a centre to the community. We want the site cleaned up but not at any cost. If this comes before North York Community Council and City Hall I will have the votes to defeat it."

Pasternak, who as a school board trustee in the area also fought this plan, said local schools are at or near capacity, and mass busing is a "disastrous option and a total disruption to the community."

Diamond setter recognized by Guinness

When the family moved to Canada in 1947, Maurice continued to sell industrial diamonds. An NFB documentary narrated by Lorne Green looked at the business and featured his father, Lewy said.

Part way through high school, a learning disability attributable to dyslexia led Lewy to realize the academic life was not for him. His father advised him to learn a trade, and Lewy chose diamond setting. He entered into a nine-year apprenticeship under Stan Levine.

"You learn everything about diamond setting. It's like learning to be a brain surgeon, there's so much to do," said Lewy.

He developed a particular aptitude for more difficult work, such as setting half-millimetre stones.

Eventually he went into business on his own, setting diamonds in all kinds of jewelry. He also served as a consultant to other jewelers on the mechanics of setting stones.

"It's like [being] an engineer," he explained.

Over time, the industry changed. Stone-setting was outsourced abroad, where skilled craftsmen would work for a fraction of the cost in Canada.

A career change followed. Lewy began training young people at George Brown College, while continuing to freelance for private customers.

Three years ago, while attending a trade show in Tucson, Ariz., he was shown a standard plastic poker chip. He said to himself, "There's something wrong with this. It has no flair. It's boring."

He began to experiment, giving new looks to the old chips. In his earliest effort, he embedded a couple of plastic dice in the chip. He went on to experiment with metal chips, using simple designs that incorporated the number seven on one side, and eight on the other.

Gerald Lewy [Paul Lungen photo]

Eight, he said, is considered lucky in some Asian cultures.

"Every few weeks, I'd come up with something else," he said. He'd wake up at 4 a.m. with an idea and jot it down.

Lewy believes his dyslexia may well have helped him. To make sure no mistakes crept in, he double-, triple- and quadruple-checks his work.

"The nice part is, I'm dyslexic and I created it. It came out of my head. There's nothing similar. Nothing comes close to it,."

Lewy proudly displays the prototype chips that preceded his record-setting one. They get progressively more intricate, with more and more glittery stones. For the models, he uses cubic zirconia instead of diamonds, imitation sapphire and imitation emeralds, to give them colour. For the final sale product, he substitutes the real gemstones.

His efforts culminated in the record-breaker, but all the while he worked on other items, like diamond-encrusted bracelets, featuring the four card suits using different precious stones. He has a diamond encrusted money clip, pendants, rings, gold-plated or solid gold dice with precious stones for pips – glitter that wouldn't look out of place on the Las Vegas strip.

His next step is to complete the line and market it to those looking for the best in luxury items.

Not bad for a guy who gave up academics to work with his hands.

Canada-Israel energy ties hold great promise

When Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu visited Canada last year, he talked about our two countries' strong diplomatic ties and shared values. Why then, he asked, don't we do more business together. Currently, two-way merchandise trade between our two countries totals $1.4 billion annually, a respectable number, but one that has the potential to grow substantially, especially in the area of energy.

Joe Oliver

You may have heard the complaint that Moses searched for 40 years in the desert to find the only place in the Middle East without oil. Well, it turns out Moishe Rabbeinu, in addition to his extraordinary spiritual leadership, had sound geological instincts, even if it took us quite a while to prove it.

Off its coast in the Mediterranean, Israel has made one of the world's largest discoveries of offshore natural gas in the last decade. There has also been a major discovery of oil shale deposits in the northern Negev, and just last month, off Ashdod. These new reserves hold the promise of energy security for Israel – an astonishing development – with great potential for its economy and security.

However, as large energy resources are a first for Israel, it has not yet acquired the infrastructure, technology, geologists, skilled trades, relevant regulatory system or capital to fully support their development. That's where Canada can help. We're a global energy leader, with decades of experience developing both offshore and onshore unconventional resources.

In my capacity as minister of natural resources, this has been the focus of my trips to Israel. They included meetings with political leaders, including the prime minister, industrialists and financiers, as well as scientists at the Technion and the Weizmann Institute.

Working with my Israeli counterpart, Uzi Landau, we announced the creation of the Canada-Israel Energy Science and Technology Fund. Through matching $5-million investments from our two governments, it's anticipated that between $20 and $40 million can be leveraged through the private sector. Brilliant Canadian and Israeli researcher scientists, drawn from academia and industry, will collaborate in unconventional oil and gas and research and development in renewable energy. This is a sweet spot for Canada, as we work to reduce greenhouse gas emissions and support green energy.

We're also working to bring companies from our two countries together to discuss opportunities for investment, joint ventures and the sale of goods and services.

By developing these scientific and commercial ties, Canadians and Israelis can reinforce political and cultural connections and build even closer relationship, based on shared values and mutual interests.

Joe Oliver is the MP for the Toronto riding of Eglinton-Lawrence.

EMSB seeks way to keep Jewish clubs

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The English Montreal School Board (EMSB) has reconsidered the cancellation of an extracurricular Jewish club for students at Royal West Academy, a high school in Montreal West.

On Oct. 1, the EMSB said it has decided that the club, which last year met weekly at lunchtime with Rabbi Dovid Pearlstein, might be able to resume in a manner that conforms with a law prohibiting religious instruction in schools.

Angela Mancini

The announcement followed the adoption of a resolution by the EMSB's commissioners requesting that the administration withdraw a directive that effectively spelled the end of the Jewish club at Royal West, as well as similar ones at Royal Vale and Westmount High Schools, and find a legal way for them to continue.

The clubs could be resurrected under "Life 101," an extracurricular program already in place at some schools. It may consist of classroom or lunchtime workshops where issues such as world religions, religion and science, and tests of faith, or broader issues such as the Holocaust and genocide, are discussed in a non-sectarian manner.

The EMSB's reversal came after a Sept. 25 report in The CJN in which the rabbi and the teacher who oversaw the Royal West club expressed surprise and disappointment that the clubs were no longer being permitted.

Rabbi Pearlstein, who is associated with Chabad's Chai Centre, said he had suddenly been told that the clubs could not go on, after several years of existence. The Royal West club received a grant from Federation CJA's Gen J program last year.

He said the clubs were open to everyone and he provided no overt religious instruction, such as prayer, concentrating instead on ethical dilemmas that all students could participate in.

The EMSB had cited Bill 118, the Quebec legislation adopted in 2000, concerning the place of religion in the public school system, which had a few years earlier been reformed from being organized along Catholic or Protestant lines to being French- or English-based.

That law stipulates that any activities sponsored by schools must be inclusive, pluralistic and educational.

"Religious services for one particular faith cannot be held in the building during or after school hours," said EMSB spokesperson Michael Cohen.

"The law clearly states that if a school wishes to have a multicultural or multifaith discussion or presentation, representative religious leaders from a church, synagogue, mosque or temple may participate only as invited guests of the trained [staff] facilitator."

In a prepared statement, the EMSB acknowledges that the Jewish club at Royal West was open to all students. The problem was that the "outside rabbi needed to be accompanied by a trained facilitator."

Rabbis and other clergy can be brought in as guest speakers for Life 101 program, as long as a "pluralistic" approach is maintained.

Royal West math and science teacher Carolyn Gehr, who brought the cancellation of the clubs to the attention of The CJN, served as her school's club director last year. That was how she was described in a press release issued by the EMSB last March about the club, focusing on its celebration of Purim.

"Royal West was in the process of preparing for a program which would meet the needs of the students and be in line with Bill 118, organized by its trained spiritual community animator when the CJN story was printed," the EMSB said.

The Royal Vale club was stopped because it was taking place without the knowledge of the then-new principal and the Westmount one "ended on its own several years ago," it said.

Royal West principal Tony Pita said he has explained the Life 101 program to a number of parents whose children wanted to take part in the Jewish club, and they're satisfied with the idea.

Gehr, who is on maternity leave this year, commented: "It has potential. Let's see how it turns out.

"It is gratifying to see that people at the board are truly searching for a satisfying solution to this issue, and not just sweeping it under the carpet."

EMSB chair Angela Mancini stressed that the board is committed to meeting the needs of its diverse student population to the extent the law allows.

"Since 2000, the EMSB has worked hard to support school environments that reflect diversity and pluralism in accordance with Bill 118," she said.

"Consequently, the schools of the EMSB have held and will continue to hold multifaith celebrations and encourage activities and clubs that honour and respect our multicultural society, in line with Bill 118, while focused on the needs of the students."

Mancini noted that the EMSB continues to offer the Heritage Language Program, commonly known by its French acronym PELO, in co-operation with the education ministry.

Quebec minister defends proposed charter

'Jewish General a jewel of Montreal community'

"The Jewish community has been an integral part of Quebec for a very long time, since they settled here in the late 1700s. They have made a major contribution to the development and evolution of Quebec society... and we believe that they continue to be an extremely important part of Quebec society today."

As for the prohibition against public sector workers wearing overt religious symbols – such as kippot, hijabs and crosses – Drainville said it's not discriminatory because "its application will be limited strictly to working hours.

"The state in no way whatsoever wants to confine or interfere with the religious convictions or morals of our citizens when they are not [employees] of the state."

It was this conviction that led the government to "confine the proposed neutrality" to these situations only, he said.

"For example, there was never any question of... limiting the wearing of religious symbols in the public sphere, as the French did with the full veil... Neither was there ever any question of limiting the wearing of religious symbols by ordinary citizens. In France, they forbade the wearing of ostentatious religious symbols in classrooms... Let's be clear: the restriction on wearing overt religious symbols will be limited only to the state and to employees of the state."

Asked about the likely effect the new legislation would have on Montreal's almost 100-year-old Jewish General Hospital, Drainville stressed that "for the Parti Québécois government, the Jewish General Hospital is a jewel of the Montreal community and of Quebec society. The hospital is an institution that has huge credibility and adds greatly to the richness of the Quebec health and social services network.

"We are very conscious of the socio-historic circumstances that led to the creation of the Jewish General in the '30s: Jewish doctors did not have the right to practise their profession in the other Quebec hospitals. There were also members of the Jewish community who had problems being treated in some hospitals," he added.

"We want the Jewish General Hospital to keep its identity and its personality. There is absolutely no question of jeopardizing the identity of this important health-care institution. Besides, we have taken note of the wishes of the Jewish General Hospital to exercise its right of withdrawal [from the requirements of the charter], renewable, as provided in the proposal... currently on the table. This would permit the employees of the Jewish General Hospital to continue to wear religious symbols within their workplace."

Nevertheless, Drainville recently said that he hopes public institutions, including the JGH, that take advantage of the proposed charter's opt-out clause won't do so forever and that they'll accept the new reality.

Asked whether there's a contradiction between recognizing the JGH as distinct and expecting it to eventually adapt to the charter, the minister said, "All I can say at this stage is that we're very conscious of the distinctive, special character of the hospital. Our intention is not to question in any way the identity of this renowned institution, which we value very highly."

This article was translated from a French story in this week's Montreal edition of The CJN.

UK envoy for post-Holocaust issues to speak

Jewish museum seeks $100,000 to survive

Joel Jacobson
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — A major fundraising event in Saint John, N.B., is expected to raise more than $100,000 for the long-range survival of the community's Jewish Historical Museum.

Andrew Burns, the United Kingdom's first envoy for post-Holocaust issues, will be guest speaker at a $100-a-plate luncheon Oct. 11 the Delta Brunswick Hotel. The former British high commissioner to Canada and Britain's ambassador to Israel will talk about the relevance of the Holocaust around the world, 70 years after World War II, in a speech titled "Still Coping with the Consequences of the Holocaust."

Proceeds from the event will go the Saint John Jewish Historical Museum Fund, administered by the Greater Saint John Community Foundation, which gives annual grants to the museum to ensure that it continues in perpetuity. The fund operates independently from the museum itself.

Andrew Burns

Retired university professor Gary Davis chairs the museum's board. Along with former Canadian senator Erminie Cohen and community philanthropist Jaqueline Oland of the Moosehead Brewery family, he helped bring Burns to Saint John for the occasion.

"Jackie knew Burns from other activities, suggested him as a speaker for us a couple of years ago, and we were finally able to co-ordinate his schedule with our event," Davis said. "He's attending an International Holocaust Alliance Conference in Toronto that week and has made time to be with us for a day."

More than 300 tickets have been sold to the luncheon, the majority to non-Jewish members of the Saint John community, which only has about 30 Jewish families remaining from a vibrant group of more than 260 families in the mid-1950s. The community was established in the 19th century.

"It was risky at the start [as we planned this], but we've had some enthusiastic support from corporations and individuals," Davis said. "We set goals, budgets and the desire to find a great speaker, and we've done it. We're hoping to sell 450 tickets by Oct. 11."

The museum, in its 27th year, was a dream of primary founder Marcia Coven for years prior to its opening in 1986. It preserves the history and heritage of the city's Jewish community through its collection and displays. It collects and preserves books, oral and video interviews, manuscripts, records, biographies, photographs and other documents that relate to the history of Jews in Saint John.

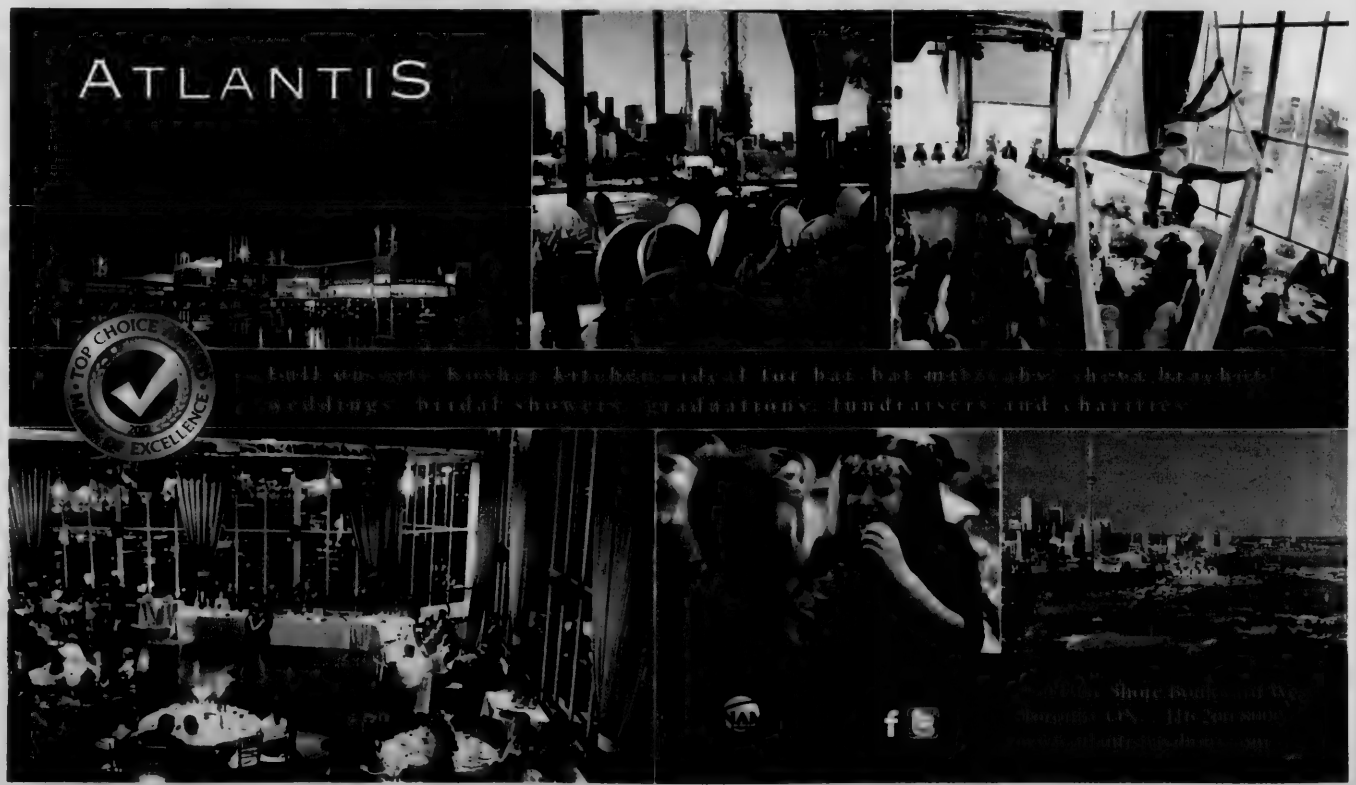
Davis said up to 7,000 visitors a year have entered the museum, which has a membership of 200, about 60 per cent of whom are Jewish, and many Saint John ex-pats now living in Toronto and the United States.

"We're encouraging those who can't be here from away to attend the luncheon to support us with a donation to ensure the museum's survival."

The museum is directed by a volunteer 10-person board, of whom three are non-Jewish: a university history professor, a Presbyterian minister and another interested community member.

"They're very interested in the preservation of the Jewish community and religion and have a great overall interest in history," Davis said.

For more information, to buy tickets or to make a donation, contact the museum's curator, Katherine Biggs-Craft, at sjjhm@nbnet.nb.ca or 506-633-1833. The museum's website is personal.nbnet.nb.ca/sjjhm.



Universities graded on level of free speech

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL—McGill University's student union rightfully deserves its failing grade for free speech for making a campus group change the name of a pro-Israel party it organized last year, according to a former group member.

"I don't know if I feel vindicated," one-time McGill Friends of Israel (MFI) board member Russel Sitrit-Leibovitch told The CJN just before making aliyah Sept. 29.

"But it is definitely satisfying to know that McGill got the bad grade it deserved."

Overall, McGill got a D average in the 2013 "Campus Freedom Index" released Sept. 24 by the three-year-old, Calgary-based Justice Centre for Constitutional Freedoms (JCCF).

According to the report, 12 of the 45 universities in the index were involved in supportive and critical incidents related to Israel that were compromised by censorship. Others included Guelph University, York University, the University of Ottawa, and Wilfrid Laurier.

The report was co-authored by centre president John Carpay and communications co-ordinator Michael Kennedy.

Kennedy was quoted as saying that free speech appears "very much in danger" on Canadian campuses.

"You have universities that cancel events organized by student groups because the ideas they're discussing are too controversial, and you have student unions who deny certification to student groups based on their views as well," he said.

The index rated the "state of free speech" – or lack thereof – at 45 Canadian public universities and their respective student unions, comparatively rating their policies ("what they say"), against their practices ("what they do").

The grades could range from A to F.

It found that 23 – more than half – "failed to uphold free expression rights on campus" because of censorship.

The incident at McGill in March 2012 coincided with Israeli Apartheid Week, which MFI – now renamed McGill Students for Israel – decided to counter with an "Israel-A-Party" event that Sitrit-Leibovitch, then a 21-year-old political science student, helped to organize.

McGill University's Arts Building

But McGill's student union – the Student Society (SSMU) – said the event's title "made a mockery of oppressions" and it obliged MFI to change it or risk losing its club status.

That decision, the Calgary centre said in its report, "sets a dangerous precedent for student groups who, like MFI, want to maximize campus interest in their events by using creative language."

Reacting to the index, SSMU president Jonathan Mooney said it's an ongoing challenge to strike a balance between what is – or isn't – acceptable to say on campus, because it's a "subjective exercise." Mooney was not on the SSMU executive at the time of the "Israel-A-Party" incident.

The University of Manitoba Students' Union tied McGill and five others as second-worst student union for its resolution to strip student group status from an anti-"Israeli apartheid" club.

Six of the seven second-worst student unions got Fs for restricting free speech, the seventh a D. They included the unions at Queen's University, Ryerson University, and the University of Calgary.

However, Judy Zelikovitz, vice president (university and local partner services) for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs said that she has read some of the report, and found some of the findings to be dubious.

"While the report makes some valid points, other passages are just not credible and suggest to us that the entire report should be taken with a grain of salt," she said. One example is the section where the researchers claim that referendum campaign spending limits constitute monetary obstacles on students exercising their right to free speech.

The jccf.ca website states that the centre was founded as a "voice for freedom in Canada's courtrooms," and its mission is "to defend the constitutional freedoms of Canadians through litigation and education."

Canadians aid Israel Tennis Centers

David Grossman
Special to The CJN

Dozens of invited guests packed a Yorkville restaurant to check out a silent auction that raised money for the Israel Tennis Centers (ITC) and to hear from a number of special guests about the ongoing community commitment to the ITC.

All in all, the 10th annual Invitational Tennis Pro Am raised more than $300,000 in a series of men's and women's tournaments involving amateurs and professionals, held at the York Racquets Club.

Thanks to the goodwill of many Canadians, tennis is challenging soccer and basketball for popularity in the land of milk and honey.

In 1979, Canada Stadium was inaugurated at the ITC's Ramat Hasharon location thanks to the support of Canadians.

In the past four decades, tennis blossomed because of a network of ITC facilities. Jewish, Christian and Muslim children of all ages get a chance to play at 14 locations scattered across the country.

According to ITC Canada's executive director, Toby Rosner, the 2013 event may have been one of the best.

"It has been a huge success," said Rosner. "So many people worked very hard and we're absolutely delighted to have reached our goal and donations keep coming in."

Rosner said this year's event highlighted a variety of tennis professionals and guest celebrities who were auctioned off to play alongside others in a series of tennis matches.

Rosner also confirmed the ITC would name a tennis court in Israel to honour the memory of former York Racquets Club member Ian Wexler, who died last March.

Harel Levy, one of Israel's all-time top tennis players, now retired, was among the celebrity group auctioned off to compete. Others included Canadian Davis Cup player Jesse Levine and former tennis pro turned commentator Brad Gilbert.

"Kids have a place to learn, to have fun, to meet others, to play tennis," said the 35-year-old Levy, now director of the centre's high performance tennis program.

Levy still talks about his 2001 Italian Open victory over Pete Sampras, a former world No. 1 player.

"There are things like that victory you never forget," said Levy, who also reached the final of the Toronto Masters tourney 13 years ago and had a career-high world ranking of No. 30 in singles.

From left, Jesse Levine, Dvora Marsha and Harel Levy

"Kids in Israel look for role models. We're trying to grow the next generation of Israeli tennis players, and it's not easy. Anytime you can take kids off the street and give them a productive opportunity, like playing tennis, I think it's marvelous," he said.

Levine, who lived in Ottawa before moving to Florida, turned pro at age 19. He's played on Canada's Davis Cup team and is still hoping to crack Canada's Olympic team for 2016. But he's not used to being put up for auction.

"I told my mother that I was being auctioned off," laughed Levine. "I told her it was all for a good cause: to help young Israeli tennis players."

"Tennis has been good to me, and it's always great to give back. It's a mitzvah to help others," said Levine, who has never been to Israel. "In Florida, I have watched young Israeli tennis players. Some of these kids have lots of talent and need to be given chances to get better."

Dvora Marsha knows it all too well. Now 29 years old, she came to Israel in Operation Solomon – the migration of thousands of Ethiopian Jews in 1991 – and, able to develop in tennis, became one of Israel's top female players.

"Tennis can change a child's life, and it had a huge impact on me in Israel," she said. "They gave me equipment, shoes, lessons and lots of confidence. It's hard to say where I would be now without that support.

"I went on to coach competitive programs and help others the way I was helped. My biggest highlight is working with kids – because I see myself from years ago."

Rosner said Canada has raised more than $20 million in almost four decades and all the money has gone toward improving tennis in Israel.

JVS installs new president at AGM

Stephen Sweet
Special to The CJN

It's the start of a new era for Jewish Vocational Service Toronto.

Lorie Shekter-Wolfson was officially named president and CEO of JVS at its 66th annual general meeting in late September, held at Beth Torah Synagogue.

Shekter-Wolfson, who was most recently assistant vice-president at George Brown College, said she's looking forward to the challenge.

"It's really exciting," Shekter-Wolfson said. "As I had said in my [introduction] speech, I've known of JVS for years and had the privilege of working with them as a partner when I was dean at George Brown and have been involved in the Jewish community on a volunteer basis.

"This is really my first opportunity to actually be a paid executive and work in the Jewish community, and it's very exciting to be able to put a stamp on that and be part of the future of this organization."

Shekter-Wolfson was formally introduced at the annual event, which also saw an appearance from York Centre MP Mark Adler and a keynote address by United Way president and CEO Susan McIsaac.

"I was honoured to be invited to come up," McIsaac said. "I have been up to the JVS on many occasions and worked with the staff and volunteers, and I feel that they are an amazing partner to United Way."

McIsaac spoke of some of JVS' and United Way's combined efforts across Toronto.

"There are still so many gaps across our city, people for whom opportunity isn't real," McIsaac said. "I think the work JVS is doing on the ground, in the community and in particular, in some of our priority neighbourhoods, is fundamental in terms of helping people get a hand up.

"When I think about youth, newcomers and neighbourhood, those are three key areas of priority for JVS," McIsaac added. "We [at United Way] are so aligned in our work that it's been at the base of our partnership for years.

"[JVS] is so important in helping to give opportunities, the kind of opportunities that can help someone be successful in life."

McIsaac said she was also impressed hearing many stories at the meeting of individuals whose parents or grandparents were helped by JVS or someone who would go on to work or volunteer there.

From left, Paul Habert, JVS chair; Lorie Shekter-Wolfson, JVS president and CEO; Susan McIsaac, president and CEO, United Way Toronto, and Kim Coulter JVS chief operating officer

"I think there's a cultural aspect to the work they do," McIsaac said. "We heard stories of people [getting help] postwar [JVS opened in 1947], and I think that's something unique in the city, something that's part of the heritage and pride of JVS, as it should be."

Shekter-Wolfson says JVS reflects a key component of Judaism.

"It's the Jewish response to tragedy, it's the Jewish response to need," Shekter-Wolfson said.

"The Jewish population has always been so successful at that, and I think that it's tremendous to have a Jewish organization be at the forefront of helping people, regardless of their background."

She said she'll oversee JVS as it tries to keep its programs functioning properly in the face of financial pressures.

"It will [involve] continuing with the level of service, diversifying the services and [working on] revenue sources," Shekter-Wolfson said.

"Governments don't have the money they once had, money that these services used to rely on. That means organizations such as JVS have to think differently about how they're going to do their services when finances are clearly a piece of that, in order to make up [for that] with all of the challenges ahead."

JVS also handed out a number of awards to staff, volunteers and individuals who have sought out their services.

Ilya Gilan was given the Joseph Skolnik Award for New Canadians, having used JVS's help when he came to Canada a couple of years ago. The Betty Skolnik Award for emerging professionals went to Aaron Herman, who now works in accounting. Cronos Consulting Group earned the David Mouckley Outstanding Employer Award for providing special initiatives to clients with barriers to employment. Arrathiyah Thirrukkumaran won the Manny Mitchell Volunteer Award for making a significant contribution to JVS over the past few years.

Survivor sees family photo for first time

Some 70 years after he last saw his father, mother, brothers and sisters alive, a survivor of the Warsaw Ghetto and Bergen-Belsen concentration camp was recently given a photograph of his family for the first time.

"When I received this photo, I said, 'This is better than winning the biggest lottery in the world,'" said 88-year-old David Zyk, who recently travelled to Toronto from his home in Melbourne, Australia, to meet the cousins who had kept the photograph over the years.

Born in Lowicz, Poland, in 1925, Zyk was 16 years old when the Nazis forced him and his family into the Warsaw Ghetto in 1941. The youngest of five children, he was the only one of his family to survive. After the war, Zyk, believing he had few relatives left anywhere in the world, moved to Australia, where he worked in a factory that made gas stoves. But he remembered that his family used to receive packages before the war from an aunt and uncle in Toronto. He knew only that his uncle's name had been Fishl Phillips and that his aunt's maiden name had been Gerszt.

Recently a distant relative of Zyk's, Ner Bresler of Brooklyn, N.Y., made contact with him and hired Toronto-area genealogist Bill Gladstone to track down descendants of the Phillips family. Gladstone used cemetery records, tombstone inscriptions, newspaper obituaries and other sources to find Phillips family members in both Toronto and Buffalo. And yes, the family had a photograph of unknown relatives from Lowicz. About a dozen members of the Phillips family – including Ronni and Bernie Garshowitz of Toronto, Ferne and Gordon Mittleman of Buffalo, and Fran and Arnold Cohen of Holland Centre, Ont. – met with Zyk and Bresler during their visit to Toronto in late September.

Mesopotamia exhibit and ancient Israel

Past Forward
Alex Gropper

The Royal Ontario Museum's (ROM) current exhibit on Mesopotamia is one of the best that the museum has mounted. Here is an area that has had a profound impact on civilization. In fact, it gave birth to civilization as we know and define it. And, as initially discussed in a previous column, its impact on Israel was tremendous.

Abraham was reputed to have come from Ur, one of the great urban centres of the Sumerians, who had the first civilization in recorded history. Ironically, the Sumerians virtually disappeared from history for thousands of years until they were rediscovered by archeologists at the end of the 19th and early 20th century.

It was in the first millennium BCE that Mesopotamia left an indelible impact on Jewish history. First the Assyrians (who are amply represented in the ROM exhibit) left their mark on ancient Israel. By 722-701 BCE they had destroyed the northern kingdom of Israel and deported a sizeable number of its inhabitants, thereby giving rise to the legend of the Ten Lost Tribes of Israel.

Then came the neo-Babylonians who, under their king, Nebuchadnezzar, sacked Jerusalem and destroyed the First Temple in 586 BCE. They also deported a large number of the upper classes to Babylon. (Some have placed the number as high as 15,000.) Who can forget the lament in the Bible that would become a dirge for the Jewish People until 1967 – "By the waters of Babylon we sat down and wept when we remembered Zion."

By this time, Babylon had become the "Big Apple" of the ancient world. The ROM's computerized re-creation gives a wonderful view of the city at its height, although the city had been founded almost 1,500 years earlier by a Semitic group scholars call the Amorites. The city reached its first peak in the Old Babylonian period around 1750 BCE under the renowned Hammurabi, whose famous law code can be seen in Paris at the Louvre.

Even this far back, there appears to be evidence of contact between Mesopotamia and Canaan. At the site of Mari, a rival of Babylon that was destroyed by Hammurabi, archeologists found a cuneiform tablet mentioning Hazor. Hazor is located in northern Israel and was excavated by the legendary Yigael Yadin in the 1950s. Its final destruction came when the dreaded Assyrians destroyed the northern kingdom of Israel in 722 BCE.

Assyria would itself succumb to the neo-Babylonian king Nabopolassar, and his more famous son, Nebuchadnezzar, under whom Babylon would reach its apogee as a cultural and political power.

Despite their famous lament, the Jews thrived in Babylon. Even after Cyrus the Great of Persia conquered the city in 538 BCE and allowed the exiles to return, a majority of them chose to remain in Mesopotamia. They then made this area a major centre of Jewish culture and learning over the next 1,500 years, culminating in the creation of the great Babylonian Talmud.

It's still a New Year

Midrashic Moments
Rachael Turkienicz

It's an exciting time in the Jewish annual cycle because all the High Holidays have ended. We have gone through the Days of Awe, the observance of soul-searching, honest self-encounters and family dynamics and politics.

We have eaten our weight in festive meals and disoriented our minds with mid-week holidays. Temporary huts appeared on our lawns, we ate with rain dripping through the sukkah roof and we finished and began reading the Torah without the chance to catch our breath for a moment.

It's the time of year when we crave a return to routines. Basically, I've prepped, apologized, atoned, fasted, eaten, shivered, shaken agricultural objects and danced and danced. I'm ready for normal.

And again, this is where the Torah steps in and reminds us that Judaism is constant movement – normal doesn't last long.

The Torah readings at this time of year plunge us into the narratives of "Lech Lecha," God's command to Abraham to leave his homeland, the beginning of the Jewish vision, the Jewish journey. It is the narrative of endless exploration and discovery as well as growth and redirection, all of which occur with God as Leader and Companion.

As with most journeys that are life-changing, time must become irrelevant or the journey becomes about schedules and deadlines. God stands outside time and, as such, so does the journey of Jewish identity. The 'Lech Lecha' journey begins with Abraham and Sarah, but it cannot be completed by them. The journey of a life takes longer than a lifetime.

Our matriarchs and patriarchs show us that this particular vision they are shaping involves a departure as much as an arrival. When God outlines the journey to Abraham, the only thing that is known for sure is what he must leave behind, not where he will arrive. And what he must leave behind is everything "normal" that he ever knew.

The High Holidays throw us into turmoil so that we can come out of them at the other end ready to begin our Jewish journey this year and excited about where it might take us. We leave behind the negative patterns we challenged as we confronted Yom Kippur and the materialistic priorities we faced during Sukkot.

We begin our journeys with Abraham and Sarah. After all the work we've just been through, both physically and spiritually, we must begin to answer the ultimate challenge of who we will become this year. And the Torah tells us that whoever we define ourselves as in the coming months, God is excited to meet us.

Every year, we become someone new, we reinvent ourselves and recognize the adventure and opportunities that lie ahead. We have left behind the "same old same old" and are no longer moving through life with a normal "comfortably numb" approach.

As the midrash has explained, "Lech" means "Go" – God has commanded us to "go" on our journey, and "lecha" is God's excited utterance of waiting "for you" – whoever the new you has become.

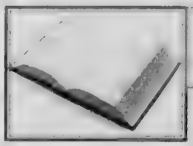
Time to rise to the challenge

Rabbi Ilan Emanuel



Rabbinic Reflections

One of the great questions of history is "Who makes history?" Are there extraordinary people who create historical reality by force of will – the "Great Person" theory? Or are famous people in history merely ordinary people who are swept up in the inevitable sweep of historical forces?

This question arises in Parshat Lech Lecha, in which we are introduced to Abraham in the middle of a conversation with God. This conversation apparently starts midstream with no context for what may or may not have gone before. We are given no background for his relationship with God. We don't know whether this is the first conversation between them or the 100th. And we don't know how Abraham came to understand that there was only one God or how he came to be chosen as the emissary of God.

The rabbis, of course, rush to fill this gap with midrash. They debate whether Abraham had been working up to this moment or was just picked at random. Some suggest that Abraham only became special because he was picked. He was the equivalent of the 100th caller to a radio show and had he not happened to be at the right place at the right time, it could well have been someone else entirely who became the first Jew and the father of all monotheistic religions.

Others argue that Abraham had special insight or ethical merit that brought him to God's attention. This, for instance, is the source of the midrash of Abraham smashing the idols in his father's shop, the idea being that he realized, even at a young age, that worshipping idols was ridiculous and God noticed.

Both approaches teach important lessons for our own lives. The first approach reminds us that we are all presented with opportunities and obstacles in life. We will all, at some point, be faced with difficult choices and wonder if we are up to the challenges set before us. Sometimes these situations may be totally unexpected and seemingly unmerited. Like Abraham, we may simply be expected to rise to the challenge, to become what the situation demands us to be. Like Abraham, we may have to "Go forth," leaving what we find comfortable and venturing out to embrace something new.

The second approach reminds us that, like Abraham, we also have merits. It is easy to doubt ourselves, to wonder whether we are worthy of achieving want we want, to play it safe for fear of failing. We so often let opportunities pass us by because we worry that we are somehow not worthy. Abraham inspires us to explore, to search, to try. We will not all discover something as monumental as monotheism, but if we don't try, we will never know what we may achieve, what we may bring to the world and to others.

At the High Holidays, we are told we have the opportunity for new beginnings. Now that the Days of Awe are over, we can learn from Abraham and take the opportunity to rise to the challenges these new beginnings provide and become the person we should be, and can be, in the coming year.

TRUE ENCOUNTERS: MEETING THE OTHER

In today's society we are encouraged to be individuals, but we must make sense of how this affects us socially, spiritually, and psychologically. How do each of us exist alongside others and create a humane and just environment? How do we deal with newcomers who arrive in Canada with nothing? These are important and current questions facing our affluent North American society.

Born in Hong Kong, Mme Clarkson came to Canada as a refugee. Today she is one of Canada's most distinguished citizens—a former Governor-General, renowned broadcaster, human rights advocate, author, diplomat and culture champion.

Family speeches at funerals: some tips

From the Bimah
Rabbi Philip Scheim

The greatest change I've witnessed in my rabbinic career has been the role of the rabbi at funerals. In the earlier years of my career, I would deliver the eulogy at a funeral. On very rare occasions in those years, a family member or friend would be invited to speak as well.

Anybody who attends funerals today knows that the reality now is quite different. Rare today is the funeral without family speeches, with the rabbi's role largely confined to ritual.

In many instances, this change is welcome, because there are times when family speeches are beautifully delivered, deeply moving and articulate a vision of the departed family member that brings great honour to all involved.

Having heard at least 1,000 family speeches over the last several years, I offer some unsolicited suggestions regarding them.

First, I respectfully suggest that the number of speakers be limited. The most meaningful services I've attended have usually involved one or two speakers, to a maximum of three. There are alternative venues available for others to offer their memories, including the tribute pages on funeral home websites. Tech-savvy family members could set up memorial pages that would host written recollections, video and audio clips. Not everybody has to speak at the funeral in order for his or her words to contribute meaningfully to the honour bestowed upon the departed.

I would also remind mourners that they are under no obligation to speak, and should not be pressured to deliver a eulogy, especially when they're not accustomed to public speaking. On several occasions, family members have shared their discomfort with me, feeling that by not speaking, they are disrespecting their loved one. I suggest to them that being a mourner is hard enough without adding the burden of public speaking when that is outside of one's comfort zone.

For those outside of the immediate family who are speaking, I offer one caution. Be sure that your subject matter is the deceased. Too often, a well-intentioned speaker spends as much time on him or herself as he or she does on the departed. "He and I used to…" or "she and I often…" should be kept to a minimum, since the room will be filled with many others who've had similar experiences with the departed, and the speaker's personal experiences aren't the subject of the hour. Those preparing eulogies should avoid the word "I" as much as possible, focusing, as fully as possible, on the life being remembered.

Finally, in the absence of family speakers, one shouldn't be wary of rabbis fulfilling their traditional role as eulogizers. Even in cases where rabbis don't know the departed, they're trained to ask the right questions, to listen to family members and to build an appropriate tribute based on the recollections gathered.

I know that some of my best eulogies have been for people I never met, whose family members' accounts of their lives deeply moved me and provided me with all that I needed to deliver an appropriate eulogy.

Shas founder Rabbi Ovadia Yosef dies at 93

Ben Sales
JTA

TEL AVIV — Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, the Israeli sage who founded the Sephardi Orthodox Shas political party and exercised major influence on Jewish law, died Monday in Jerusalem. He was 93.

Born in Egypt, Rabbi Yosef served as Israel's Sephardi chief rabbi from 1973 to 1983, and extended his influence over the ensuing decades as the spiritual leader of Shas, which politically galvanized hundreds of thousands of Sephardi Israelis, though Rabbi Yosef himself never served in the Knesset. At its height in 1999, Shas was the third-largest Knesset party, with 17 seats.

Rabbi Ovadia Yosef

Though he adhered to a haredi Orthodox ideology, Rabbi Yosef, a charismatic speaker, published relatively liberal Jewish legal rulings and drew support from traditional and secular Sephardi Israelis as well. Known to his followers as Maran, "our master," in Hebrew, Rabbi Yosef's main Jewish legal goal was to take diverse Jewish practices from the Middle East and North Africa and mould a "united legal system" for Sephardi Jews.

As his influence grew, Rabbi Yosef presided over a veritable empire of Sephardi religious services. Shas opened a network of schools that now has 40,000 students. Rabbi Yosef managed a kosher certification called "Beit Yosef" that has become the standard for many religious Sephardim. And he was a dominant power broker when it came to electing Sephardi chief rabbis and appointing Sephardi judges in religious courts. This year, Rabbi Yosef's son – and preferred candidate – won the Israeli Sephardi chief rabbi election.

Through his work, Rabbi Yosef hoped to raise the status of Israel's historically disadvantaged Sephardi community, both culturally and socio-economically. He dressed in traditional Sephardi religious garb, including a turban and an embroidered robe, even as most of his close followers adopted the Ashkenazi haredi dress of a black fedora and suit.

As a scholar, Rabbi Yosef was known for his ability to recite long, complex Jewish tracts from memory. His best-known works, Yabia Omer, Yehave Da'at and Yalkut Yosef, cover a wide range of Jewish legal topics.

"He was a character that people capitulated in front of, a man of Jewish law that created a political entity with strong influence on Israeli politics and culture," said Menachem Friedman, an expert on the haredi community at Bar Ilan University. "It raised up Middle Eastern Jewish culture, gave legitimacy to Middle Eastern Jewish traditions."

Outside the religious community, Rabbi Yosef was best known for his sometimes controversial political stances. His authority within Shas was virtually absolute, and even in his ninth decade, he remained closely involved in the party's decisions. While he favoured policies that served the religious community's interests, Rabbi Yosef also supported peace treaties involving Israeli withdrawal from conquered territory. He argued that such deals were allowed under Jewish law because they saved Jewish lives. In the 1990s and 2000s, Shas joined left-wing governing coalitions multiple times, allowing for the advancement of the Israeli-Palestinian peace process – though the rabbi opposed the 2005 Israeli withdrawal from Gaza because it was done unilaterally.

In his later years, Rabbi Yosef also stirred controversy with a number of inflammatory statements, often made at a weekly Saturday night sermon. In 2000, he said that Holocaust victims were reincarnated sinners, while in 2005 he said that the victims of Hurricane Katrina deserved the tragedy "because they have no God." In 2010, Rabbi Yosef said that "the sole purpose of non-Jews is to serve Jews."

Rabbi Ovadia Yosef was born Abdullah Yosef in Baghdad, Iraq, on Sept. 23, 1920. His family moved four years later to Jerusalem in what was then Palestine, where Rabbi Yosef studied at the Porat Yosef yeshiva, a well-regarded Sephardi school. At age 20, he received ordination as a rabbinic judge, and at age 24, married Margalit Fattal, who died in 1994.

He began serving as a rabbinic judge in 1944, and in 1947, moved to Cairo to head the rabbinic court there, returning in 1950. He continued serving as a religious judge until becoming Sephardi chief rabbi of Tel Aviv in 1968, a position he held until he was elected Sephardi chief rabbi of Israel in 1973. During that period, he began publishing his well-known works, beginning with his Passover Haggadah, Hazon Ovadia, in 1952. Rabbi Yosef defeated a sitting chief rabbi in the 1973 election, itself a controversial move. In the wake of the Yom Kippur War that year, he ruled that women whose husbands were missing in action could remarry. Later in his term, he endorsed the Ethiopian Jews' claim to Judaism, helping them immigrate to Israel under the Law of Return.

Rabbi Yosef founded Shas in 1984, one year after finishing his term as chief rabbi. The party now holds 11 seats.

Women of the Wall approves prayer space, with conditions

JTA

TEL AVIV — The group Women of the Wall has agreed in principle to pray in a new egalitarian space adjacent to the Western Wall Plaza, provided the new section meets several of its conditions regarding the new section's design and management.

Until those conditions are met, Women of the Wall said in a statement that its members will continue praying at the women's section of the Western Wall, as the group has for 25 years. Before now, though, the group had stated that a new, egalitarian section of the wall would not be "relevant" to its needs.

Monday's policy change brings Women of the Wall in line with other non-Orthodox groups in Israel, such as the Conservative and Reform movements, which saw the new section as an answer to their requests for pluralism at the holy site. Yizhar Hess, CEO of the Conservative movement in Israel, called the change "a very positive step."

The egalitarian section, to be located in an area adjacent to the plaza known as Robinson's Arch, was first proposed in April as part of a plan by Jewish Agency for Israel chairman Natan Sharansky to resolve religious conflict at the wall.

Women of the Wall meets at the beginning of each Jewish month for a women's service at the Western Wall. Women of the Wall's chair Anat Hoffman told JTA that the policy change will give the group more influence over how the new section is designed.

In order to pray in the new section, Women of the Wall is demanding that the section be equal to the existing plaza in size, topography, budget and facilities. In addition, the group is demanding a unified entrance and a shared plaza between all of the wall's sections.

The group is also demanding that a body of Jewish leaders, with equal women's representation, run the new section. The existing plaza is managed by the Western Wall Heritage Foundation, a haredi organization.

Some of these changes may be difficult to implement. Altering the topography of the plaza would require approval from the Islamic Waqf, a body that controls the Temple Mount and has historically been resistant to any such changes. Israeli Economy Minister Naftali Bennett had a temporary platform erected at Robinson's Arch in August, but Women of the Wall said it doesn't meet their needs. Until Monday, Women of the Wall seemed defiant in its commitment to keep praying in the women's section. The group scored a legal victory in court this year that allowed its members to pray without fear of arrest, but members have faced ongoing opposition and harassment from traditionalist opponents. The group's most recent service on Oct. 4 was the calmest in months, but the women still encountered opponents screaming and – according to some reports – spitting as they prayed.

PM says Iran must stop its centrifuges

Netanyahu struck a similar chord in Sunday's speech, saying that sanctions on Iran should be lifted only if Iran ceases enriching uranium and plutonium, and stops its centrifuges.

He also said the United States and Israel see "eye to eye" on the need to prevent Iran from getting a nuclear weapon.

"Ask a simple question to Iran's rulers," Netanyahu said. "If you only want nuclear power for peaceful purposes, why are you enriching uranium and plutonium? You don't need these at all for peaceful nuclear energy, but these are the essential ingredients for nuclear weapons.

"The international community's position needs to be that we are ready to come to a diplomatic solution, but only one that gets rid of Iran's ability to develop nuclear weapons."

Israel to seek seat at UN Security Council

JTA

NEW YORK — Israel's Ambassador to the United Nations, Ron Prosor, said Israel will seek a seat on the UN Security Council for the first time.

Prosor told Reuters Oct. 3 that Israel would vie for a seat on the 15-member panel, the United Nations' most powerful forum, for 2019-2020.

"We're going all out to win," Prosor told Reuters. "It's about time."

To win one of the 10 two-year rotations on the Security Council, which also has five permanent members with veto power, Israel would need to secure two-thirds of the votes in the General Assembly, made up of 193 member states.

The Security Council has the power to pass binding resolutions backed by force. Prosor said Israel would compete against Germany and Belgium for two seats allocated to the Western European and Others group, to which Israel belongs.

Muslim countries have kept Israel from joining the Asia-Pacific group.

European anti-circumcision motion 'fosters hate,' Israel says

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel called on the Council of Europe to rescind a resolution which it said was "fostering hate" because it equates non-medical circumcision of boys with female genital mutilation.

"This resolution casts a moral stain on the Council of Europe, and fosters hate and racist trends in Europe," Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs wrote in a statement last Friday.

"We call on the Council of Europe to act without delay in order to annul it."

The resolution in question was part of a report that the parliamentary assembly of the Council of Europe passed on Oct. 2. The Council of Europe is the continent's main human rights co-operative body. Its resolutions are non-binding.

Entitled Children's Right to Physical Integrity, the report called non-medical circumcision of boys a "violation of the physical integrity of children" and mentioned it along with female genital mutilation.

"Any comparison of this tradition to the reprehensible and barbaric practice of female genital mutilation is either appalling ignorance, at best, or defamation and anti-religious hatred, at worst," the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs wrote in the statement.

Israel rarely condemns motions by the Council of Europe or other institutions that do not concern it directly.

"Claims that circumcision harms young boys' health and body are false, and do not rest on any scientific evidence," the statement further read.

Several European Jewish groups have condemned the resolution, including Milah UK and the European Jewish Congress.

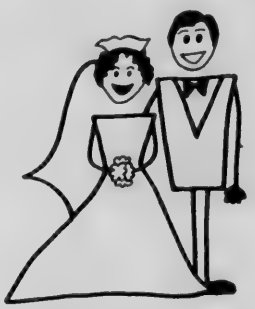
Survey finds high U.S. rates of intermarriage

Uriel Heilman
JTA



NEW YORK — There are a lot more Jews in the United States than you may have thought – an estimated 6.8 million, according to a new study. But a growing proportion of them are unlikely to raise their children Jewish or connect with Jewish institutions.

The proportion of Jews who say they have no religion and are Jewish only on the basis of ancestry, ethnicity or culture is growing rapidly, and two-thirds of them are not raising their children Jewish at all.

Overall, the intermarriage rate is at 58 per cent, up from 43 per cent in 1990 and 17 per cent in 1970. Among non-Orthodox Jews, the intermarriage rate is 71 per cent.

The data on Jewish engagement come from the Pew Research Center Survey of U.S. Jews, a telephone survey of 3,475 Jews nation-wide conducted between February and June and released last week.

The population estimate comes from a synthesis of existing survey data conducted by the Steinhardt Social Research Institute and the Cohen Center for Modern Jewish Studies at Brandeis University.

While the Steinhardt/Brandeis study, called American Jewish Population Estimates: 2012, is likely to be a matter of some debate among demographers and social scientists, it's the Pew study that offers an in-depth portrait that may influence Jewish policymaking for years to come.

Among the more notable findings of the Pew survey:

• Overall, 22 per cent of U.S. Jews describe themselves as having no religion, and the survey finds they are much less connected to Jewish organizations and much less likely to be raising their children Jewish. Broken down by age, 32 per cent of Jews born after 1980 – the so-called millennial generation – identify as Jews of no religion, compared to 19 per cent of baby boomers and just seven per cent of Jews born before 1927.

• Emotional attachment to Israel has held steady over the last decade, with 69 per cent of respondents saying they feel attached or very attached to Israel. Forty-three per cent of respondents said they had been to Israel.

• Far more respondents said having a good sense of humour was essential to their Jewish identity than observing Jewish law – 42 per cent compared to 19 per cent.

• Approximately one-quarter of Jews said religion is very important in their lives, compared to 56 per cent among Americans generally.

The Pew study is the first comprehensive national survey of American Jews in more than a decade. The last one, the 2000-01 National Jewish Population Survey (NJPS), was conducted by the umbrella organization of North American Jewish federations and counted 5.2 million Jews, including children. But critics said that study's methodology was flawed and undercounted American Jews.

Both the Pew survey and the Steinhardt/Brandeis study put the number of U.S. Jewish adults at about 5.3 million, including Jews who don't identify as Jewish by religion. The Steinhardt/Brandeis study counted an additional 1.6 million Jewish children for a total of 6.8 million Jews in America. The Pew study counted 1.3 million Jewish children.

Overall, Jews make up about 2.2 per cent of Americans, according to Pew. By comparison, 6.06 million Jews live in Israel, according to Israel's Central Bureau of Statistics.

Because of the differences in methodologies between the new surveys and the NJPS, the increased number of U.S. Jews likely overstates any actual growth.

Leonard Saxe, one of the authors of the Steinhardt/Brandeis study, told JTA there has been some growth during the last decade, but he could not put a number on it. Saxe attributed the growth to the immigration of Russian-speaking Jews, programs to bolster Jewish identity and shifts in attitude that have enabled many children of interfaith marriages to be raised with a Jewish identity.

The Pew study found that about 10 per cent of American Jews are former Soviet Jews or their children.

About 65 per cent of American adults who identify as Jews by religion live in just six states, according to the Steinhardt/Brandeis estimates: New York (20 per cent), California (14 per cent), Florida (12 per cent), New Jersey (eight per cent), Massachusetts (five per cent) and Pennsylvania (five per cent). The other four states in the top 10 — Illinois, Maryland, Texas and Ohio — add another 15 per cent. The three most Jewish metropolitan areas are New York, South Florida and Los Angeles.

Among Jewish denominations, the Reform movement remains the largest: 35 per cent of respondents identified as Reform, according to the Pew study. The second-largest group is Jews of no denomination (30 per cent), followed by Conservative (18 per cent) and Orthodox (10 per cent).

As with other studies, the Pew study found that the Orthodox share of the American Jewish population is likely to grow, because Orthodox Jews tend to be younger and have larger families than Jews generally. In addition, while past surveys showed about half of respondents raised as Orthodox were no longer Orthodox, the Orthodox retention rate appears to be improving, with just a 17 per cent fall off among 18-to 29-year-olds.

Most denominational switching among American Jews, however, remains in the direction of less traditional Judaism.

While most of those surveyed by Pew said they felt a strong connection to Israel, and 23 per cent reported having visited the Jewish state more than once, the respondents expressed significant reservations about the current Israeli government's policies vis-a-vis the Palestinians.

Forty-four per cent said West Bank settlement construction hurts Israel's security interests, and only 17 per cent said continued settlement construction is helpful to Israeli security. Thirty-eight per cent of respondents said the Israeli government is making a sincere peace effort with the Palestinians.

Indonesia's last synagogue destroyed

JTA

JAKARTA — Indonesia's last synagogue has been destroyed, a Dutch news site reported last week.

Unidentified persons demolished the Beith Shalom synagogue in Surabaya on the island of Java to its foundations sometime earlier this year, according to a report on Indoweb.nl.

The synagogue has seen a number of anti-Israel protests staged in front of it and was sealed by Islamic hardliners in 2009, according to the Jakarta Globe.

Reports of the synagogue's destruction have appeared in Indonesian media since May and were confirmed last week by the Indoweb.nl, which quoted the director of the Surabaya Heritage Society as saying that he intended to protest the demolition in talks with government officials.

"It is not clear by whom and when exactly the building was demolished," Freddy Instanto told Indoweb.nl.

The City Council of Surabaya was in the process of registering the building as a heritage site. Istanto said that for that reason, the building "should have been protected."

Situated in eastern Java, the small synagogue was built in the 19th century by Dutch Jews when Indonesia was still a Dutch colony. The first Jews arrived in Indonesia in the 17th century with the Dutch East India Company. During the 1930s and 1940s, the community grew due to new arrivals fleeing persecution in Europe.

Currently, about 20 Jews are estimated to be living in Indonesia, a predominantly Muslim nation, according to Beit Hatfutsot, the Museum of the Jewish People in Tel Aviv.

Canadian chosen for competitive NYC-based fellowship

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

A Toronto student was one of 15 people recognized for their involvement in student life with a fellowship at Yeshiva University (YU) this year.

Michali Sturm, who studied marketing at the YU's Sy Syms School of Business, graduated this past spring. Although she was planning to move back to Toronto after graduation, she decided to stay in New York City once she was offered the fellowship position.

She is one of two non-Americans chosen for the fellowship this year – the other, Marganit Rauch, is from London, England.

Now in its 10th year, the program gives graduates the opportunity to work for YU while developing leadership skills and connections through working on projects to improve campus life.

It was created in 2004 to keep some of the school's best students involved in campus life, as well as giving them the opportunity to begin their careers with involvement in Jewish organizational work, said university president Richard Joel.

"It's a group of passionate, very unique individuals who all have very different experiences at YU, but have a similar underlying goal to enhance and give back as much as they can to the institution," Sturm said.

Some of the activities include skill-development workshops, leadership-training seminars, and meetings with various professors. The participants also get the opportunity to learn from people such as philanthropists Michael Steinhardt and Ronald Stanton, author A.J. Jacobs and human rights activist Brooke Goldstein.

Sturm said the fellowship is helping her move toward her goal of working in market research. She said the fact that the fellowship is so people-oriented – she's working in YU's Office of Student Life – makes it similar to working in marketing.

"In market research, you work with the consumer mind to come up with a better product," she said, adding that she's doing exactly that in her fellowship – working with the student body to find ways to improve the school.

She described her experience at the school as very positive. Not only was she able to learn in small classrooms, getting to know the professors, but she also became very involved in several campus groups, including the marketing club, fashion club and a number of business clubs.

Michali Sturm

"The more I became involved in the school throughout my time there, the more I benefited from it," she said.

That's why she decided to accept the fellowship. "I wanted to do it from a different perspective, and have the opportunity to give back."

Dr. Sydney Taylor ז"ל

Shimon Ben Yitzchak Ve Ettel

March 5, 1925 to September 13, 2013 (10 Tishrei 5774)

After a courageous, lengthy battle to survive, our Royal Canadian Air Force Veteran of World War 2, esteemed, respected, and adored Dentist and Dental Surgeon, passed away in Toronto at Veterans Centre, Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre. To the moment of his passing, Syd's hands were held, his forehead was kissed, and words of eternal gratitude and love were whispered in his ears by his loving and devoted wife of 68 years, Ethel, his daughter Shauna, and his son-in-law Jamie. He was pampered by his 24-hour Caregivers, Andrea Reyna and Maricela Altamirano. A most dearly beloved and cherished husband of Ethel Goodman Taylor, adored, respected, and worshiped father of Shauna Leigh Taylor (Oppenheimer) and Jamie Oppenheimer, the late Dean Jordan Taylor, much-loved Grampy of his "GrandDoghter" Jasper (the miniature schnauzer), cherished son of the late Isaac and Jeannie Taylor, beloved son-in-law of the late Benjamin and Jennie Goodman, brother of the late Trevor Taylor, Sybil Taylor, and Dorothy Siderson, and loving Uncle of Mark Cooper, Frank Cohn, Joanne Taylor Hillsdon, Shellie Siderson Rosenberg, and Michael Siderson. Brother-in-law of the late Mary Rapp, Lillian Krevat, Rose Shumacker, Bess Zeleny, and Samuel Goodman. Will also be deeply missed by his many cousins, friends, and patients. The family is grateful to Dr. David Gladstone, the nurses at Sunnybrook Hospital, C Wing 4th floor, and at the Veterans Centre K Wing East, 3rd Floor. Service took place at Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel, 2401 Steeles Avenue West on Monday, September 16, 2013. Interment Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue section at Dawes Road Cemetery. Shiva was held at 4 Sulgrave Crescent, Toronto, ON, M2L 1W6.

Russian-born entrepreneur a turnaround specialist

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

There was a time when newly arrived Soviet Jews found Canada's free enterprise system baffling.

Running a business, turning a profit, what was that all about?

Not so these days. When Marat Ressin arrived from Moscow five years ago, he was already an entrepreneur with an impressive track record of success. Though trained as a mathematician, he had switched careers and become a turnaround specialist, acquiring decrepit old enterprises, installing his own management team and turning them into going concerns.

Moving to Toronto, he applied what he had learned in Russia, investing in small businesses and the real estate they inhabit, renovating them and renting them to tenants who provide each other with a synergy that allows them to feed off each other. Ressin focuses on smaller plazas and commercial buildings, often finding new uses for the space they contain.

"My niche is small business. All my practical and theoretical business knowledge related with it. No big malls. No real estate itself, only as a part of a particular small business project. I never had a project with a budget more than $20 million," he explained.

As in Russia, his success has given him the time and capital to indulge his other great passion, helping others in the community. He is a supporter of the Jewish Russian Community Centre (JRCC) and he's actively involved in trying to assist charities to operate on a more business-like basis.

Recently, he conceived the York Entrepreneurship Development Institute (YEDIntitute), which subsidizes the business education of prospective entrepreneurs, as well as those in the not-for- profit sector. Many of the first cohort of students come from the Russian Jewish community.

Ressin, 44, estimates he devotes about half his time to charitable endeavours. For years he has been involved in PresenTense, a volunteer-run organization that helps Jewish innovators in Russia, the United States and Israel develop their ideas into ventures that support local communities.

Marat Ressin

"I like to do social stuff, something that benefits people," he said.

Still, it's the business side of things that pays the bills.

On the walls of his office, photos display some of the buildings across the GTA that he acquired and later sold off. One was purchased for $7 million, renovated and new tenants brought in. It was sold two years later for $10 million.

Another commercial building cost him $2 million and, after undergoing the Ressin treatment, was appraised at $3 million, only three months later.

"The buildings have to fit the projects," he stated. "If the project needs a single building, it will be a single building. 'How many' also depends on a moment. I buy and sell. I never had more than 14 buildings at a time. Today I have five multi-unit commercial buildings in Moscow, one multi-unit and three single buildings in the GTA. No one building is bigger than 30,000 square feet. Price range may vary from $1.5 million to $20 million, depending of the project needs."

Leverage is an important factor in Ressin's business plan. He doesn't invest his own money in the projects – the acquisitions are financed through loans, mostly from banks, but about 30 per cent comes from private investors, many of them Russians and Russian Jews.

In Russia, investors receive their money back plus 50 per cent of the profit. "In Canada I can use the bank's money and for the rest, the investor gets six per cent per year plus 15-20 per cent of a profit when the company is sold or when the investor's money is replaced with additional bank [funds] after reappraisal," he stated.

Russians have a somewhat different way to look at investments than Canadians, he explained. In Russia, annual reports and financial statements are barely worth the paper they're printed on.

"There are too many fake records," he said. Investors visit the business to see for themselves what it's all about. And they particularly value the individual running it. Personal credibility is paramount, and that has transferred to his affairs in Canada, Ressin said.

"You have to do everything properly because it's your name, your reputation," he said.

Back in Russia, Ressin wrote a PhD thesis on small business crisis management. "I used my own results, my own statistics, because I did 30 companies," he said.

His knowledge of math played a key role in his early success. "Business is about structure and understanding how things work. Math makes you think systematically and that is the most important thing."

In the 1990s, not long after the Soviet Union collapsed, "there was no interesting work in Russia. There was chaos there. I decided working in a small business was more interesting than sitting in a scientific institute with nothing to do."

There were a lot of Soviet-era enterprises around, but nobody around who could run them on a profitable basis. At the end of 1993, "I had a serious car accident and spent a lot of time in hospital. I had a lot of time to think. I thought of operations that could succeed in different areas of business."

When he recovered, he found investors to support his acquisition of various small businesses. "People had money at the time from different Soviet organization, but all the systems were destroyed and they had no idea what to do with the money."

He used borrowed funds to get into businesses in the construction field, in a bakery chain, a china factory along with its retail outlets.

"I buy something when I have an idea of how to improve it dramatically," he said.

He also found that diversifying hedged his risk. "I understood it was not possible to survive if you had only one company."

One acquisition in particular brings a smile to his face. It was a factory that assembled computers. There was no computer market in Russia at the time, and the company quickly filled a much-needed niche. It also "was a good way to improve the lives of people," he said.

In Toronto, he's particularly proud of a commercial building that's been turned over to cultural uses, including a theatre and ballet studio, as well as a small plaza whose basement was given to the JRCC for use as a furniture bank.

"I really believe we are here to make the world better," he said.

The immigrant experience still resonates today

Literary critics sometimes use hallowed words to describe writers who have contributed brilliant works to English literature but whose first language was not English.

Two supreme examples come to mind. Polish-born Joseph Conrad (1857-1924) did not learn English until he was in his 20s, yet he became one of the language's great novelists and storytellers (Heart of Darkness, Lord Jim, The Secret Agent). And Russian-born Vladimir Nabokov (1899-1977) began his literary career writing in Russian but switched to a masterful and playful English in which he wrote the remarkable Lolita and other esteemed works.

Numerous Jewish writers probably also belong on this list, especially since Jewish literature is one of few world literatures carried out in a host of languages including Hebrew, Yiddish, French, Spanish and English. For me, American writer Abraham Cahan deserves special praise for the high quality of the English prose he composed, even while immersed in his native Yiddish milieu in New York.

Born in Vilna in 1860, Cahan did not begin to learn English until after arriving in America in 1882. He applied himself diligently to the task, always keeping a dictionary handy and transcribing newly encountered words, phrases and idioms in a notebook. To increase his vocabulary he read scores of works by Dickens, Thackeray, Trollope and other novelists, as well as poets, philosophers and historians. All this industriousness began to reap rewards in the late 1880s, when he began selling pieces to major American magazines such as McClure's, Cosmopolitan and the Commercial Advertiser.

Cahan is perhaps best known as the editor of the Forverts, New York's most popular Yiddish newspaper, which he helmed from 1902 until shortly before his death in 1951; he also penned its popular advice column, A Bintel Brief. The paper was politically socialist, but Cahan watered down the political ideology in favour of more populist and friendly content that would better reach the masses – he preferred to help his vast "green" Yiddish-speaking readership better understand their new homeland with logical explanations of everything from the American banking system to baseball. Under his legendary tenure, the paper's weekly circulation rose spectacularly from a few thousand to about 250,000 by the early 1920s.

Between newspaper deadlines, Cahan managed to pen short stories and a couple of novels in English, including one of the great classics of Jewish immigration fiction The Rise of David Levinsky – a book that gave non-Jewish New Yorkers an exclusive insider's view of the insular Yiddish-speaking Jewish society in their midst.

It was while convalescing from abdominal surgery in 1913 that Cahan began writing this important novel. After the first segments were published that year in McClure's, the editors clamoured for more. Cahan obliged them by churning out several additional parts, all of which he revised and expanded upon in preparation for the novel's publication by Harper and Brothers in 1917.

One hundred years later, The Rise of David Levinsky still stands as a robust and vivid portrait of Jewish life on the East Side of New York between the 1880s and the post-World War I era. "Abraham Cahan's epic masterpiece is the American novel of immigration par excellence, as it should be: no one knew the millions of eastern European Jews who arrived in America between 1881 and 1924 better than Cahan did," writes literary critic Josh Lambert.

Cahan modelled the semi-autobiographical book in part after The Rise of Silas Lapham, a popular 1885 novel written by his mentor and literary idol, William Dean Howells, pioneer of a new modern style of social realism. Breaking with a longstanding romantic tradition, writers of social realism embraced the commonplace in American society, sought to demonstrate the dignity of the common man, focused on the class system and other defining social factors, and described characters and their surroundings with an almost photographic verisimilitude.

Unlike most literary depictions of Jews at that time, his Jewish characters are not derogatory stereotypes and they do not speak a comically degraded form of English or Yinglish – Cahan had an excellent ear for realistic dialogue. Cahan's novel delves into topical attitudes and issues involving capitalism and socialism, the merchant class and the labouring masses, unionized and non-unionized labour, and morality and ethics within America's garment industry, all carefully expressed through character.

Levinsky's fictionalized autobiography, which the title character narrates in the first person, begins with an account of his impoverished childhood and youth in Russia that, above all, has the ring of authenticity. Levinsky is raised by his widowed mother, who sacrifices and slaves so that he may study Talmud. After she is tragically killed by anti-Semitic thugs, he decides to go to America. But before leaving, he acquires a first taste of romantic love – a diversion from the "straight and narrow" path he had intended for himself. Many more diversions follow.

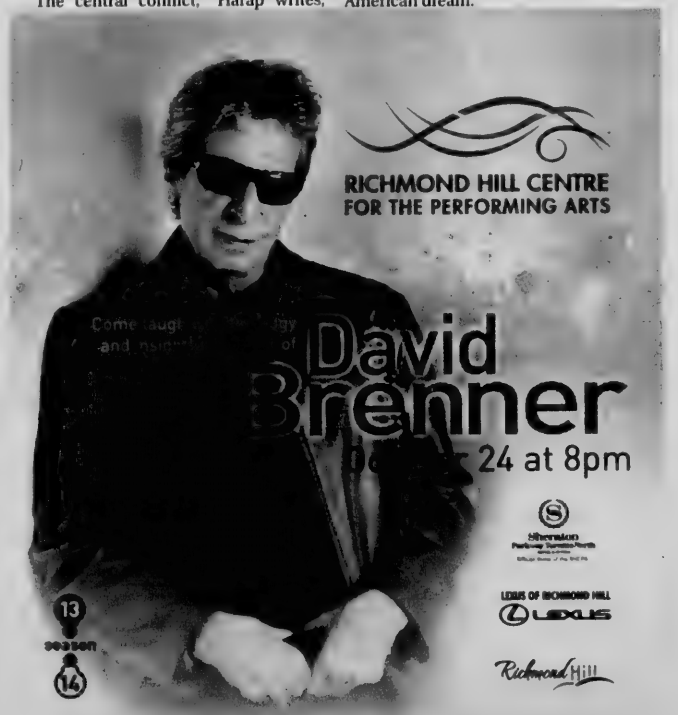
In America, Levinsky loses his beard and religious ways and gains fluency in English as he transforms himself into an American. Ambitious, industrious and willing to take risks, he rises by degrees from hungry tailor to wealthy magnate. As Levinsky explains at the top of the first chapter: "I was born and reared in the lowest depths of poverty and I arrived in America – in 1885 – with four cents in my pocket. I am now worth more than two million dollars and recognized as one of the two or three leading men in the cloak-and-suit trade in the United States."

The secret of Levinsky's success is that he compromises on his socialist values and makes an end-run around the unions: as a factory boss he runs a non-union shop, pays religious Jews lower wages and exempts them from the usual requirement of having to work on the Sabbath and Jewish holidays. While he prospers economically, his romantic life is problematic. Unable to find a marriage partner, he has an affair with a married woman and then, years later, falls in love with a younger girl who disdains his air of self-made capitalistic arrogance. At the end of the story, he lacks for no material thing but cannot quell the yearning in his soul. He admits he was probably most satisfied as a poor lad poring over the Talmud in the Antomir synagogue.

After a century, The Rise of David Levinsky is still a vibrant and accessible read that brings the period elegantly back to life and preserves the life of a charming American-Jewish capitalist in a literary time capsule. But it also begs the question: did Cahan have any themes or morals in mind? As Louis Harap observes in his wonderful and perceptive study, The Image of the Jew in American Literature (1974), Cahan used the exercise to articulate his own internal contradictions and conflicts – a set of feelings that likely seemed more relevant to readers of his own era.

"The central conflict," Harap writes, "was between fidelity to his intellectual, social and esthetic convictions and his capitulation to expedience and the lure of success."

Today few people, except perhaps fervent followers of the Occupy movement, would have any such pangs of conscience about succeeding in business in accordance with the glittering promise of the American dream.



Actor has 21 roles in postwar-Germany play

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Toronto actor Brendan McMurtry-Howlett plays 21 characters in the multi-award winning, one-man show... And Stockings for Ladies, a play set in postwar Germany.

The play revolves around its writer Attila Clemann's step-grandfather Ted Aplin who was an RCAF officer stationed in Germany after the war. He wrote the play based on a series of letters Aplin wrote to his wife back in Canada.

"Their main objective was to make sure the German air force program was completely dismantled but when they got there the retreating Nazis had mostly done their work for them," McMurtry-Howlett says. "So, Ted was finding they were just twiddling their thumbs with nothing to do."

The Bergen-Belsen concentration camp was close to his unit's base so Aplin ended up defying RCAF orders and visiting the thousands of displaced people still living in the camps.

"The British Army, the Red Cross and the UN were all there helping to bring some normalization and Ted ended up getting quite deeply involved using all sorts of RCAF resources like trucks, fuel and food. He would also take the orphans out for picnics," McMurtry-Howlett says.

"One of the biggest things he did was establish a postal service circumventing the resources of the RCAF—getting all the airmen to write home requesting things from friends and family like clothing and getting it sent to the camp through the RCAF."

These actions got Aplin in trouble because the displaced persons issue was a sticky political situation at the time, which no one wanted to touch. According to McMurtry-Howlett, Aplin thought that was nonsense, and made things happen of his own will.

McMurtry-Howlett originated the role over six years ago while studying at the National Theatre School in Montreal. He says every time they have come back to it, it's been re-honed. Wherever he's performed it, someone has come out of the woodwork, to say they knew Ted Aplin or have a personal connection to this story or the people in it.

So for this production, there will be projections throughout the show of all the photographs the production company has accumulated over the years, whether through the Aplin family or audience members who later shared their resources.

McMurtry-Howlett says it is a story that doesn't get told a lot. "I know when I was at school learning about World War II and the Holocaust, the information I was given ended at liberation. The story of what happened afterwards was so complicated and equally devastating and it doesn't get told, especially the Canadian involvement," he says.

Brendan McMurtry-Howlett stars as Ted Aplin, and 20 other characters, in ...And Stockings For Ladies.

"The show gives Canadians an opportunity to recognize an unsung hero that had a huge impact on so many peoples' lives, in fact an international impact that up until this play came along, has been completely untold. I think there is a lot of pride that our country can take in our involvement and our history of getting involved in human rights issues."

The actor says playing so many characters is interesting, but can get a bit schizophrenic at times because there are so many different voices that echo around in his head all at the same time.

McMurtry-Howlett has performed and directed nationally and internationally. His theatrical credits include Richard III, Pride & Prejudice, Innocence Lost, Bea, The Winter's Tale, The Overwhelming and The Apology, for which he garnered a Dora nomination.

McMurtry-Howlett is also the founding artistic director of Shakespeare in the Ruff. He was recently listed in Now magazine as one of Toronto's artists to watch for.

...And Stocking for the Ladies is presented by the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company and is directed by Zach Fraser. It runs at the Studio Theatre at the Toronto Centre for the Arts until Oct. 24.For tickets : 1-855-985-2787 or www.hgjewishtheatre.com.

Waterloo exhibit devoted to the Holocaust

Jordan Adler
Special to The CJN

A long row of footprints made from sand-cast glass and cement, wiped over with black paint and earth, leads from the main area at the Canadian Clay and Glass Gallery in Waterloo, Ont. into a dark, cave-like room. The black footprints walk toward a circle of shiny, silver glass footprints piled on top of each other.

The feet represent the death marches from Auschwitz to Birkenau. Since the cavernous room recalls a kiln or oven, the effect is haunting. The shiny footprints are a tribute to members of artist Laura Donefer's father's family who the Nazis murdered during the Holocaust.

Laura Donefer's installation ends on a note of hope, the artist says.

"I wanted to honour all of the victims, but at the same time I wanted it to end on a note of hope," says Laura Donefer, an artist from Harrowsmith, Ont. "I was thinking of the circle of life and the pathway to resurrection and hope."

The installation is part of a new exhibit at the gallery, entitled WAR: Light Within/After the Darkness. It is Waterloo's first art exhibit devoted to the Holocaust.

The art pieces deal with resistance, survival and the potential for hope in cataclysmic circumstances.

"You must have hope in order to resist, and then you can see and create beauty if you have hope," says gallery curator Christian Bernard Singer. "The idea of hope is really integral to being able to get through anything. It's the idea of someone not forgetting their own humanity."

The exhibit was inspired from Singer's grandmother, who told him stories about when her mother would receive letters from Jews in Europe begging to come over to Canada during the 1930s.

"After the war, the letters stopped coming and everybody found out what really happened. My great-grandmother was wracked with guilt about that... and that guilt transferred to my grandmother," Singer says. "She would tell the story about it and she would cry. It had a real impact on me."

Another section of the gallery features works from their permanent collection by Jewish and gay artists. The Nazis would have considered these works to be degenerate.

Several of the featured artists in this exhibit have a connection to the Holocaust or were inspired by stories from the war.

Toronto artist Mary McKenzie's piece, called Departed, features a living room with half of the surface destroyed and turned to ash. Some of the details from this space were inspired by the home of her husband's family, who lived in a Dutch village during the war.

The setting recalls what homes that were bombed looked like after an attack, frozen in a moment in time. In Departed, the living room has a sofa, carpet and piles of folded laundry. To create these ghosts of the past, McKenzie dipped the articles of clothing into clay and fired them so that the item burned but a clay molding remained.

Toronto artist Mary McKenzie's piece Departed features a living room with half of the surface destroyed and turned to ash. The exhibit runs until March 16.

"What I wanted to convey by the laundry was that it was not just a room. It was a room that was lived in," McKenzie says. "When we see laundry, the details of you as a person are embedded in that. That becomes very intimate and very universal."

Meanwhile, in a memorial from Ottawa husband and wife artists Oded and Pamela Ravek pay tribute to the six million Jews murdered, as well as to Oded's mother and her two sisters who survived Auschwitz.

"It's a miracle that she survived," Oded explains. "She actually told me not long ago that every night before she goes to sleep, she sees the camp. It never leaves her. Her mother was taken to the gas chamber in the last few days before [the Jews] were liberated."

Oded and his son had his mother's number emblazoned on their arms as a sign of remembrance.

In another installation, Hanging Forest, from Toronto artist Chari Cohen, suspended porcelain trees dangle over a cracked earth surface on the ground. The hope lies in the grass that spikes up from the bottom of the platform.

The grass has been planted there and will grow right into the trees as the exhibit continues. WAR: Light Within/After the Darkness will run in Waterloo until March 16.

Miami makes the perfect winter getaway

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Miami, this sub-tropical city of over two million people attracts tourists all year round. If working on a tan is your first priority then head over to Key Biscayne Beach or the very popular South Beach where beautiful bodies dot the pristine landscape. There are a host of activities offered on these beaches including swimming, jet skiing, paddle boarding, kayaking and parasailing. scooters, roller blades, bikes and Segways are available to rent.

A great way to see Biscayne Bay is from the water on one of Island Queen Cruises tours or a personalized two-hour sightseeing tour aboard a Zodiac boat from Ocean Force Adventures. The more adventurous can catch a sightseeing flight from Key Biscayne on a Cessna 172 Seahawk Seaplane.

Attractions include the Jewish Museum, Coral Castle Museum & Sculpture Garden, Airboat Tours Gator Park, Flamingo Gardens, Viscaya Museum Gardens, and the Miami Seaquarium. A highlight at this world-class marine-life entertainment park is the Dolphin Odyssey Experience at Dolphin Harbour which includes a deep water swim pulled by a dolphin as well as a handshake and a very wet kiss.

After dinner enjoy a night of music at the Frank Gehry designed, New World Symphony Center or theatre at the Ziff Ballet Opera House at Adrienne Arsht Center for the Performing Arts. Upcoming shows include We Will Rock You, Elf, Once and War Horse. The Flat is an intimate lounge catering to the after-dinner crowd. Cozy couches surround a baby-grand piano with a colourful sketch of Ray Charles on the lid. The place just invites one to sit back and relax.

After midnight and it is time to party! At the time most Canadian bars serve last call, Miami's bars and clubs begin to rev up. The latest offering on the Miami Beach late-night scene and the nightclub to be seen in, is Mokai Ultra Lounge. You might even catch a celebrity or two dancing the night away.

Speaking of celebrities, you can sleep like one at one of Miami's beautiful hotels. Arguably, the grandest is the Four Seasons Hotel Miami, an AAA Five Diamond Award property. The sleek, 70-storey building on downtown Miami's Brickell Avenue was built in 2003 with 221 guest rooms and suites. This urban retreat underwent a multi-million dollar renovation in 2011. Designed with Miami-flair and European-style elegance all rooms have a lovely city or Biscayne Bay view.

Four Seasons' guests are also invited to the Hilton Bentley in South Beach at 1st and Ocean where they have complimentary access to beach amenities including umbrellas and chaise loungers.

Off the seventh-floor lobby is the Edge Steak and Bar in the Four Seasons Hotel Miami. Kosher meals can be ordered from outside the hotel in advance.

Artist gets personal in graphic novels

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Andy Stanleigh always knew he wanted to work in the arts.

"Drawing and painting have been my first loves," said the 36-year-old Toronto-born artist.

But Art Spiegelman's 1992 Pulitzer Prize-winning graphic novel Maus – a story about the author's father's experiences in the Holocaust, told using mice as Jews and cats as Nazis – was one of the key texts that inspired him to delve into graphic novels.

Stanleigh now runs an independent publishing company called AH Comics with high school friend Michael Tymczyszyn. Together, they have released three graphic novels, including Titan: An Alternate History, their biggest release to date, available from major retailers such as Indigo Books.

That accomplishment was a result of Stanleigh's chutzpah. He walked into the head office in Toronto and asked them to stock his book. Luckily for him, one of the directors in charge of buying new books happened to be there, and the company was interested in expanding its graphic novels section at the time.

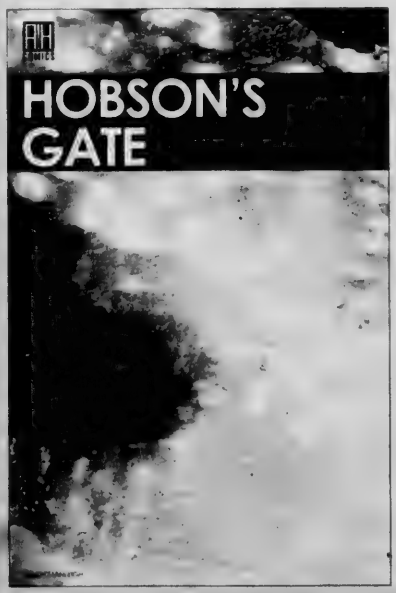
"I just did the old school thing and decided to pound the pavement," he said, adding that he often shares that advice with people. "It doesn't matter if people say, 'Send us an email.' You've got to do the legwork."

Titan tells the story of a "megalomaniac badass" who is reincarnated several times throughout history, and each time, he tries to take over the world. It's told in four different time periods, each with its own distinct drawing style.

Stanleigh called the 96-page project a daunting task.

"It's not something you can do in your spare time and get done in a reasonable amount of time. Life gets in the way," he said.

So, although he had a steady job as a graphic designer, when a client offered to support him while he worked on the graphic novel, he jumped at the chance.



The risk was made scarier by the fact that it was the second time he had taken that route. The first time didn't pay off – he ended up spending six months looking for work. But this time was different. He was working with Tymczyszyn, who wrote the script for Titan.

"We just seem to click. I seem to get exactly what he's going for. His notes to me are always like, 'Dude, this is better than what I had imagined when I was writing it,'" he said.

Not all of the projects are collaborations between Tymczyszyn and Stanleigh. One book, Delta, is a collection of drawings that are meant as a visual companion to local band The River Pilots' most recent album of the same name. As listeners go through the album, they're meant to open the page and experience the images.

AH Comics' most recent release is a graphic novel called Hobson's Gate, which is a story that Stanleigh both wrote and illustrated. It tells the story of detective Joseph Hobson, who is facing his own personal demons in the form of anxiety and panic attacks, while at the same time, facing what may be real demons out in the world.

Much of the story takes the form of journal entries, with Hobson sharing his thoughts about his anxiety. For example, near the beginning of the book, he writes, "You're convinced that you can't trust your spouse, your partner, your best friend. Other people, they don't see what you see. What you see is dangerous, and they're letting the danger in. Maybe it would be better if I was alone. I need to feel safe."

This story is one that's quite personal for Stanleigh. He took a lot of the journal entries right out of his own journals from a time when he was going through his own struggles with anxiety and panic attacks.

The novel is filled with dark drawings in very muted colours. Most pages are entirely black and white except for some muted tones, red blood, or as on one page, a bright police caution sign. Stanleigh said the idea was to convey the way he felt in those days, and the way the character is currently feeling.

"Life isn't good, and it's just muted colours," he said. "You're walking outside and it could be a beautiful fall day with beautiful leaves and you just don't see it."

Thankfully, he said he was lucky enough to have people to help him overcome the obstacles, but he described writing the comic as being very cathartic.

"It was a really good process to see what my mindset was during that time and see where I am now," he said.

Stanleigh plans to continue the story with two sequels, the first of which he hopes will be ready for a December release. The second will be released at Toronto ComiCon, which will take place the weekend of March 7, 2014.

Parenting the parent

Married With Kids
Lauren Kramer

Some days I'm in the mood for a good pity party. It's usually times when the housework is overwhelming, the kids are fighting, the weather is downright lousy and all I really want is to head over to my mom's for a good dinner.

I want the burden of that one extra chore lifted from my shoulders by her caring spirit, the comfort of commiserating with her and the reminder, just by being around her, that in many ways, I'm still a child in an adult's body, a 41-year-old who needs looking after.

There's no question, there are times in your adult life when you just want to be a kid again. You want to feel a comforting hand on your head, a warm, enveloping hug and soothing words from your mom or dad, reminding you how well you're coping with your responsibilities and how proud they are of the adult you've grown into. It's words and actions like these that sooth the hard edges of raising a family, balancing a budget and trying to be a dutiful, doting child, sibling, parent and friend to those in your life. Which is sometimes a hard act for any of us to keep up consistently, no?

To those readers who still have the luxury of able-bodied parents who love and cherish them, count your blessings. The rest of us know only too well how quickly that luxury can be wrenched from you, how sudden is the transformation from an adult who is still parented to an adult who has to become a parent to their own aging parents.

It's a transition from being cared for to being the one doing the caregiving, and it's a one-way street with no possibility of a U-turn. Once that transition has occurred, worry becomes a constant feature of your life. That warm, mellow feeling of being loved and cared for by your parents is replaced by a hovering anxiety that flips around in your belly like a wet fish. You worry about whether your parents are making sound decisions, whether they're eating three healthy meals a day and whether they are still sufficiently capable of taking care of themselves.

Often the answers aren't easy to fathom, while heartfelt, honest discussions with a parent who refuses to recognize the extent to which they've aged are even harder.

Over the past decade, I've watched that transition happen in my life. It turned me from a guest at my parent's table to the hostess issuing the dinner invitations, making the chicken soup and keeping the mealtime conversations flowing. I know I'm lucky to have a parent at my table, privileged to have the time, energy, good health and money to make a nice meal.

But every now and then, my inner brat starts whining about how it's not fair.

"Why can't I still be the kid?" the brat laments. "How come I have to do everything?"

It's a journey, this road to parenting your parents, and it gets harder before it gets easier – with complex, heart-wrenching decisions we have to make for our own parents at some indeterminate point in the future.

Ideally, along the way, we become fully formed grown-ups who face up to all the responsibilities of life with stoicism, strength and courage. That means permanently banishing the childish brat who lives within us, eliminating the pity parties and accepting that life is just not fair.

Helping kids cope with failure

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Tamara Levitt's goal is to help people find calm within chaos.

She's the founder of Begin Within, a production company that creates and develops books, apps, videos and film properties, and her first book, Happiness Doesn't Come from Headstands, teaches that happiness doesn't come from external achievement.

"Even in the face of failure, peace can be found," Levitt said.

In a epilogue to her 38-page picture book, which she wrote and illustrated, she said that it's the first of what she hopes will be a series.

"I wrote this story to offer an alternative to The Little Engine that Could, which claims that practice makes perfect," she said in the epilogue.

"In my experience, no matter how hard we try, there are times we are unable to achieve a goal, and it is difficult to find peace in those times. By letting go of the idea that happiness depends on achieving a single, external goal, we free ourselves to discover joy from within."

Levitt told The CJN that she can relate to the book's protagonist, a little girl who couldn't learn how to do headstands.

"If I relate, then others do as well," she said. "We have to teach kids alternatives to equating happiness with success and give them a new framework to view the world."

She said unhappiness is an epidemic in North America, and failure often leads to self-hatred or defeat.

"We are too hard on ourselves, and we don't allow room for happiness," Levitt said.

The book is relevant to readers ages six to 60, she said. "Parents need to pay attention, because their kids model their behaviour after them."

Happiness Doesn't Come from Headstands, is available on Amazon and on Levitt's website, beginwithin.ca.

Theme Dessert Night

Randy Fingrut
Special to The CJN

Theme restaurants are all the rage in Asia. My daughter Carly has been teaching English for the last three summers in Hong Kong, Singapore and Taiwan. She has sent me the most interesting and colourful pictures from restaurants like the Hello Kitty Cafe where all the food is shaped like Hello Kitty, the Barbie Cafe, The Ninja Restaurant, A380 an airplane restaurant, and yikes, the Modern Toilet Restaurant, where they, well I won't tell you.

Over the years I have made murder mystery dinners, Japanese and Pan Asian themed dinners and many dress-up tea parties. But the favourite and most well received theme party is my Italian dessert night. The desserts aren't actually Italian, but when my guests sit down at a table that is decked out with a red and white checkered tablecloth, they think that they are going to be fed an actual Italian dinner.

SPAGHETTI AND MEATBALLS CAKE

Pasta desserts are not such a weird concept, actually there are many desserts made of pasta. The Italians are known for Torta di Tagliatelle, fresh pasta cake, while the Jews of Eastern Europe have been creating kugels, sweet pasta puddings with cottage cheese, raisins and cinnamon, for centuries. Of course the pasta in this cake is really just icing!

Base of Cake

Banana Cake With Chocolate Chips

9 in. spring form pan lined with a circle of parchment paper and sprayed with canola oil.
3/4 cup canola oil
1 cup sugar
2 eggs
2 tsp. pure vanilla
6 large ripe to overripe bananas
2 cups flour
1 tsp.baking soda
1/4 tsp. salt
1/2 cup semi-sweet chocolate chips

Preheat oven to 350. In food processor, mix oil, sugar, eggs and vanilla. Add bananas and combine well.

Add dry ingredients and pulse until combined. Add chocolate chips and run machine until chips have been combined and some chips are chopped into smaller pieces.

Pour into pan and tap on counter to remove any bubbles. Bake for 50 minutes or until a toothpick inserted in the centre of the cake comes out clean. Cool for 10 minutes and run an offset spatula around the outside of the cake. Remove cake from pan and remove the parchment paper. Transfer cake to a large pasta bowl or platter. Set aside until completely cooled.

Spaghetti

1 can of white frosting
4 drops yellow food colour

Mix frosting with food colouring until well blended. Fill a piping bag, with a plain circle tip, with frosting. Pipe spaghetti strands starting at the bottom of the cake up the sides to about 2-3 inches in from top edge. Leave the middle area of the cake empty. Continue circling and overlapping with the piping bag over already piped strands until it resembles spaghetti on a plate.

Tomato Sauce

1-2 jars low sugar strawberry jam

Heat jam for 1 minute in the microwave. Spoon some jam to cover open space in middle of the cake

Meatballs

1 box of Ferrero Rocher, about 16 pieces

Place chocolates in a bowl and cover with jam and toss. Place over jam covered area of cake, some "meatballs" on top of others.

Parmesan Cheese

Shaved white chocolate, using a vegetable peeler or grater or flaked coconut

Sprinkle chocolate or coconut "cheese" over meatballs.

When cake is all assembled keep refrigerated until 1 hour before serving. May be prepared one day ahead.

ICE CREAM PIZZA

Make this amazing dessert in advance, and then freeze it until party time. Use a metal pizza pan to get the best effect. Use your imagination to come up with additional interesting toppings.

Pizza Crust

1/2 cup butter
1/4 cup sugar
1/2 tsp. pure vanilla
1 cup flour

Preheat oven to 475. In food processor, combine butter, sugar and vanilla. Add flour and pulse until combined. Remove from processor and form into a ball. Flatten and pat into the bottom of a 16- in. pizza pan, thicken the crust around edge of the pan to resemble an ordinary pizza crust. Bake for 8 minutes. Cool. When cool, cover and place in freezer.

Pizza Toppings

- 1 litre french vanilla ice cream = Mozzarella cheese
- 1 jar strawberry jam= tomato sauce
- dried banana chips = sliced zucchini
- cashew nuts, unsalted = mushrooms
- green and red candied cherries, diced = red and green peppers
- flaked coconut = shredded Parmesan cheese
- green candied cherries, whole = olives

When the pizza crust is frozen, warm strawberry jam for 1 minute in microwave.

Slice whole green cherries in half and place a piece of red cherry in hole to resemble olives with pimento.

Spoon about 1/4 of the jam around outside edge of crust up to thicker edge. Then spoon 1/4 more of the jam over the entire crust. Soften the ice cream and spread it over the crust to thicker edge. Spoon more jam over the ice cream to resemble tomato sauce showing through cheese.

Sprinkle banana chips, cashew nuts, diced cherries, sliced cherry "olives" and coconut over pizza. Place in freezer until frozen. Remove from freezer and wrap well in plastic wrap, return to freezer until ready to serve.

Cut pizza into wedges with a pizza wheel (cutter.)

OLD-FASHIONED APPLE CRISP

5 lbs. McIntosh apples
Grated zest of 1 orange & 1 lemon
2 tbls orange juice
2 tbls lemon juice
1/2 c sugar
2 tsp cinnamon
1 tsp nutmeg

TOPPING:
1 1/2 c flour
3/4 c sugar
3/4 c brown sugar
1/2 tsp kosher salt
1 c oatmeal
1/2 lb. cold butter, diced

Preheat the oven to 350°. Grease a 9" x 14" baking dish. Peel, core, cut apples into large wedges. Combine with zests, juices, sugar, spices. Pour into baking dish. To make topping, combine flour, sugars, salt, oatmeal, cold butter in bowl of electric mixer fitted with paddle attachment. Mix low speed until mixture is crumbly and butter is the size of peas. Scatter evenly over apples. Bake 1 hour until top is brown and apples are bubbly. Serve warm.

Brides

It's the marriage that counts

Ella Burakowski-Cohen

Just a few more days and all the plans for the big wedding will come together – 120 people, food, music, all the rentals for the perfect wedding under the stars in my backyard. Even the weather was co-operating. My aunt and uncle came all the way from Israel. Even though my Uncle Lipman was not in the best of health, it was important for him to be at his niece's wedding. Lipman and my father were the only members of their family who survived the Holocaust, and although they lived thousands of miles apart, their bond was strong.

Rabbi [Moshe] Stern insisted I go to the mikvah, not something I had planned to do, so my Aunt Sonia, my sister Sarah and I all made an evening of it. It was a very foreign ritual for me, but somehow I felt a little purer when it was over, maybe even a little more worthy of such a special occasion when I was committing myself to the man who had been such a huge part of my life since I was 15 years old.

We met just a year after my mom died, Marshall's mother had a massive stroke around the same time I went through my trauma. We were both pretty broken teenagers when we met.

Fast forward 12 years, and we were about to get married. Then it happened. The phone rang: my father was downtown at Simpsons with his brother Lipman, and he took ill. They rushed him to Mount Sinai Hospital, where they told us he had a myocardial infarction. "English, speak English!" I said, but I couldn't hear anything anyway. My head was spinning and my dad was dying.

Sarah, Marshall and I spent days at the hospital, and when we weren't there, we were cancelling all the wedding plans. We only had a few days left. Every single person had to be called and I had to relive it over and over. Most of the services I had booked were gracious and returned deposits.

A couple of days before the wedding was supposed to happen, I went to see my dad in the intensive care unit. Rabbi Stern was standing beside his bed. My dad was hooked up to tubes and monitors and the room was filled with those awful beeping noises. I looked at him lying there, pale and weak. He heard me say hi to the rabbi and opened his eyes.

"You're not cancelling your wedding," he said to me in Yiddish.

"Okay, Abba," I said, trying not to upset him.

Then Rabbi Stern spoke and said that in our religion you don't cancel a simchah. He explained that I didn't have to have the elaborate event I had planned, but that the wedding should indeed take place.

Ella and Marshall sit with Ella's dad, Fishl Burakowski

My head was reeling, and I thought these two had lost their minds. In a million years, I was not having a wedding. But alas, Marshall and I relented for the sake of my dad. Neither of us wanted to upset him any further.

So the wedding was back on – not the one we had planned, but nonetheless a wedding. Marshall had cancelled his tuxedo, and the food, the photographer, videographer, tent, and music were also cancelled. I still had my wedding dress, because it was a gift from my sister.

Sarah went to the Open Window Bakery on Bathurst Street and the "Double Dip" was now my wedding cake. She made tuna and egg salad sandwiches, and that became the food we served at my home after the wedding.

We called only close friends and immediate family, and the ceremony did indeed take place on Oct. 2, 1983 at Shaarei Tefillah Congregation with Rabbi Stern officiating. The chazzan hummed a morose tune as my sister walked me down the aisle, both of us fighting back tears.

Marshall, Sarah and I went down to the hospital to spend the rest of the day with my dad. None of us had changed out of our wedding clothes. When we walked into his room, he was sitting up, tubes removed, a big smile on his face and tears streaming down his cheeks, at the sight of me in my wedding dress. He came home a week later and lived another 12 years.

This month, Marshall and I are celebrating our 30th wedding anniversary. If only I knew then what I know today, I would not have fought marrying this incredible man who stood strong by my side that day and who continues to walk beside me through all of life's journeys. It was never about the wedding. It's all about the marriage and all about family.

Sometimes I watch young people making elaborate productions when they plan their weddings, with every detail in place, every flower accounted for and every bow perfectly tied. If something goes wrong, it's like the world has come to an end. I think to myself, if they put that same effort into their marriage, they'll be as happy as we are.

Hôtel Le Cantlie Suites great honeymoon spot

Elaine Cohen
Supplements Co-ordinator

Hôtel Le Cantlie Suites, a 28-storey, 252-room, four-star hotel in Montreal, boasts a new look after receiving a fabulous facelift this past summer. Everything from décor to furnishings and new pillow-top beds add additional charm to the beautiful boutique hotel.

Situated in Montreal's prime downtown location at 1110 Sherbrooke Street W., the edifice was built by the Cohen family in 1963 and adapted to a hotel in 1989.

The facility has always evolved to meet the needs of the times. Moreover, the spacious rooms are considered a luxury by today's standards.

"Even our smallest guest rooms are large at 430-500 square feet and others run as high as 530-1,250 square feet," said Joanne Cohen, who along with her husband Douglas, is the hands-on director of operations.

The guest rooms used to be apartments, which accounts for the enormous square footage, she said. The rooms include the king studio with sofa bed; studio with two queen beds; junior suite with king bed and sofa bed; executive king suite with sofa bed; executive suite with two double beds; and premier one-bedroom suites. In some instances, french doors separate bedrooms from other sitting, dining and kitchen areas.

European kitchenettes or full kitchens enhance units, and the rooms are tastefully decorated in soft earth tones. Besides a full complement of furnishings, paintings, mirrors, and flat screen LCD TV sets, other items are included. Bathroom supplies include eco-friendly sundries.

"Guests can arrange a lengthy stay or book for a night or two. We're flexible," Cohen said. The owners take pride in providing good value for the dollar and giving efficient, courteous service. "Our staff is experienced and well trained."

Today, family members, friends and career people reside all over the world. Hence, from the moment they receive an invitation to attend an event in Montreal, they begin planning the trip. Whether the occasion involves a wedding, bar mitzvah, anniversary, or corporate meeting, people often extend their stay to explore the sights, enjoy shopping, attend sports events, conventions or concerts. Consequently, Hôtel Le Cantlie Suites offers the best of both worlds.

Hosts have a choice of banquet halls and facilities at Hôtel Le Cantlie Suites. They can arrange parties and gatherings. "We don't have a kosher kitchen but we can supply kosher meals," Cohen said.

In addition, hosts can request special rates for a group booking that applies to guests staying at the hotel. One need only peer out the expansive guest room windows to catch captivating views of the St. Lawrence River and/or Mount Royal. Hôtel Le Cantlie Suites is one block away from Peel Metro.

The hotel is close to upscale boutiques, stores, restaurants, sports and cultural centres, museums, universities, movie theatres, taxis and public transit. Numerous places are within walking distance, and valet parking is available.

Among the hotel's numerous attractive facilities are a seasonal rooftop pool, a wireless network throughout the hotel, restaurants on the premises, 24-hour front desk service, and fitness and business centres.

The Mezannine Bar and Mez Café look out on Sherbrooke Street. Guests can order light meals at the Mez Café, a full-service restaurant complete with a glowing fireplace. Homemade cookies and fresh home baked muffins are a sampling of sweet endings on hand. Guests seeking Asian specialties can visit Fusion, a restaurant on the premises.

The knowledgeable concierge at Hôtel Le Cantlie Suites assists guests seeking information regarding sites and events. For details, phone 514-842-2000, ext. 2806.

Special to The CJN

My fiancée Cassie pretty much lives on the ice.

Between work and play, she wears her skates just about every day and she loves it.

She's even suggested, on multiple occasions, that we get married on the ice (you're joking about that right? Right?).

So when the thought process came about on where I should propose to her, I knew right away what to do.

The only problem was, she had an idea that a proposal was coming up, so I really had to throw her scent off.

Whenever we would pass Putting Edge, the site of our first date close to four years ago, I would comment on it, and that it was an important spot for our relationship and such. I even told her that I had bought a coupon to use there.

It wasn't before long that she unhappily figured that I would propose there.

That, of course, freed me up for our proposal on the ice.

I booked a rink in Richmond Hill for an hour one evening and let her know that we could go out and play hockey, just the two of us, and she was immediately on board.

Her only concern was that I had picked a time where my brother and his wife couldn't join us, to which my brother (who was privy to my plan) convinced her that it was okay to go without them.

Since eating right before playing hockey is not ideal, I had special food waiting at my house for afterwards – General Tao's chicken, breaded veggies and potato salad from Ely's.

Although we had never eaten anything from there together, I had heard Cassie say before that those were her favourite foods (and it is now tangible proof that I do listen to her!).

When the time came, as was the case on our first date, I insisted on picking her up.

We got dressed and went on the ice. I intentionally wore a t-shirt from a hockey tournament I'd played in with her, both because of its meaning and that it required me to wear a light jacket, where, zipped up in my pocket, was her ring.

Intentionally, there was nothing around to create the mood or feeling that there would be a proposal that night. We took shots, practised a few breakout drills, and worked on skating.

After about a half-hour on the ice, I suggested we do one-on-one drills. I tried to get around her to score a few times and then offered to switch.

As she went out to the blue line with the puck, I unzipped my jacket pocket. I knew this would make it easier to pull out the ring later.

On the third try, she got around me and scored. After that, we skated out to the blue line, which was where I had planned to propose to my defenceman-girlfriend.

But anyone who knows Cassie is aware that she doesn't stay still for long, especially on the ice. She started skating away with the puck while I took off my helmet.

I got her back briefly, and then needed something to keep her from skating away again.

"Can you check my helmet? I think there's something wrong with it," I said.

"It looks fine," said Cassie, glancing over briefly before skating away.

"No! It really isn't," I said. "Can you hold it and check it, please?"

"Fine," said Cassie, who wasn't too pleased about having to slow down for a moment.

With Cassie's back to me and her eyes focused on my helmet, I had my chance. I slipped around her, dropped to one knee, pulled out the ring box and opened it. I did everything smoothly and perfectly.

Except Cassie wasn't looking.

"Cassie?" I asked.

"What?" she said, still having not turned around.

"Maybe you should look here now," I said with a smile.

Cassie turned around and saw me on one knee, with the ring.

"Oh my God," said Cassie, dropping to her knees.

I barely got the right words out in time, but it didn't matter. I knew the answer was yes.

We hugged and went onto the bench, where I phoned my parents, and she called her parents and grandparents to let them know.

Cassie was beaming and speaking excitedly, looking at her new ring.

Until, the inevitable moment happened.

"Can we go back on the ice and play a little more now?" Cassie asked.

So what's it gonna be?

Rita Poliakov
Special to The CJN

There was no majestic sunset when I got engaged. There were no babbling brooks, no graceful doves, no blimps spelling out a lovesick plea.

Instead, my fiance and I had a fight on the way to our anniversary dinner. Then he left me in a bar. All in all, it was a perfect night.

I say that without a hint of sarcasm. And here's why:

Dima isn't what you would call a cookie-cutter kind of guy. With freckles, a slight Russian accent and a penchant for bathroom humour, he's kind of like Mork, from Mork & Mindy. He's sweet, he's lovable and he may or may not be from another planet.

The night he decided to pop the question was the night we were celebrating our three-year anniversary. We had moved in together the week before and we were just sorting through the co-habitation thing. To say that I wasn't expecting to come home with a ring would be an understatement. Dima was still in school and we spent the majority of our relationship living in different cities. So when Dima asked me to cancel my plans for the next day (so that we could celebrate with our families ... duh) I got angry. Here we were, only a week into co-habitation and he was already stopping me from seeing my friends. I said no, but he was adamant. So we fought, and then sat in silence as he drove us to a bar.

"OK, I'll leave you here for a bit," Dima said. Not angrily, but nervously.

So he bought me a beer, sat me down and left me to fume at the downward spiral that was, in my mind, our anniversary dinner. After putting our names down on a reservation list at a restaurant he insisted on keeping secret (it was the Keg. It's always the Keg), he came back and we settled in to watch a UFC fight playing at the bar. Well, I settled in. Dima fidgeted and endlessly checked the time. Then, just as the fight was getting good, he announced it was time to leave. The main event, it seemed, would take place elsewhere.

Not much for convention, Dima didn't bother waiting for dessert. Just as the main course was coming out, he told me to close my eyes and turn around. He'd bought me a small anniversary gift, it seemed. And honestly, I expected to see a pair of earrings. So when I opened my eyes and saw a ring, I was confused. And Dima was silent. Dead silent. He stood next to me, holding the ring, and I kept thinking "Where are the earrings?"

Dima, who has never run out of things to say, was rendered speechless. Finally, just as I realized the shiny diamond in my face might be more than an anniversary gift, he spoke.

"So," he said, a nervous grin on his face, "What's it gonna be?"

Not "will you marry me." Not "I love you." So what's it gonna be?

"Yes. Of course yes."

The restaurant burst into applause, we kissed, and I sat in stunned silence. A waitress materialized out of thin air with some complimentary champagne and the table next to us – a group celebrating the birth of their eighth grandchild – told us on which finger the ring goes.

Ten months later, two months before our wedding, I've had a lot of time to think about that night. And I wouldn't change anything. Not the fight, not the bar, not the silence. Our engagement story may not be a YouTube phenomenon, but it's exactly what I wanted. Even if I didn't know it at the time.

Blind date number 3 is a keeper

Shirley Kellerstein
Special to The CJN

Joe was my blind date number 3. I was his blind date number 10. His four-year troubled relationship had come to an abrupt end one month before the planned wedding and he was now having a wonderful time with his new bachelorhood.

I had been living in Israel for two years and was now home for the summer holidays to visit my family and friends. I was making arrangements to have what I would need shipped to Israel. That's where I planned to spend the rest of my life.

It was July of 1980. My mother, may she rest in peace, had missed me terribly while I was gone and got it into her head that if I fell in love, I would stay in Toronto.

She used to play cards with all the other "greenes" at Earl Bales Park and she let everyone there know the situation. She asked their help to find a man for me. I chuckled at the idea of "being peddled in the park" and indulged her. I had no intention of staying here, but I couldn't be with my friends every evening and had no problem with the idea of a pleasant evening out.

Before Joe was supposed to pick me up, blind date number 4 had called. He was so obnoxious on the phone that I refused to go out with him. When Joe called to say he was delayed and if I preferred, we could go out another time, my answer was, "No, let's get this done and over with." I let Mom know that I would not go out on any more blind dates.

Shirley and Joe on their wedding day

From the very beginning there was an ease – a level of comfort I had never experienced with another man. Joe didn't have a car, and we walked to a local restaurant for coffee. It was like we had known each other all our lives. We met at the end of July and we spent as much time together as possible. Joe, of course, met my family and all my friends that summer. We had a wonderful time.

The day before I was scheduled to leave, Joe and I were at the Fire Pit on Yonge Street, a local burger favourite, where he told me he loved me and would wait for me to come back. He gave me a lovely bracelet. He also gave me a letter to read after I left. I was shocked, and answered that he was a good guy but my life was in Israel and I wasn't going to change my plans for a man.

That evening, at my going away party, all I could think about was Joe's declaration. On the plane, I opened his letter which I almost couldn't read, his handwriting was so bad. But I did manage to make most of it out and he reiterated what he had told me. Joe was, and is, the romantic in our relationship.

Back in Israel, I realized how much I missed Joe. When I confided in my dear friend, Sonya, she told me, "You're crazy. Israel will always be here for you. Joe won't always be waiting." Two weeks after my return to Israel, I phoned Joe and asked him if he wanted me to come home. His answer was, "Go for it."

We were engaged on Remembrance Day, about a month after my return.

We have celebrated our 32nd anniversary and to this day I thank Sonya for her wise advice, and Mom for "peddling me in the park". I still chuckle with the belated knowledge that mothers are always right.

The Wedding

The wedding date was July 1, 1981.

During the two years I was in Israel, I lived a very simple and pared down life. The thought of a formal wedding did not appeal to me at all. I wanted a party – a celebration that included our closest friends and family. When Sara, my older and wonderful sister, offered her home for a backyard wedding, it seemed perfect.

My parents vetoed the idea, feeling that they could not have a small wedding and exclude some of their friends and "landsmen". After quite a bit of conflict, Sara once again came through for me. She somehow convinced my parents that a backyard wedding could be beautiful and elegant.

Our wedding was perfect

Looking back, I am shocked at how uninvolved I was in the planning. I had an idea of what I wanted, and it didn't really occur to me until my own sons' bar mitzvahs how much effort was involved. My father chose the invitations. Sara, knowing what I wanted, planned the whole wedding, insisting on my approval of all the details.

The day dawned dark and gloomy. Joe had to go up to Sara's house twice to help move the tables and chairs: The first time, downstairs to the basement because it was raining, the second time, back out to the backyard because it seemed the sun had come out to stay. Including ourselves, there would be 100 people there that night. Sara had accounted for the bad weather and figured that between the living room, dining room and basement there would be enough space.

Our wedding was perfect. The chupah, on the backyard patio was held by Joe's brother, my brother and Joe's two closest friends. Sara was my matron of honour. Daphna, my youngest niece was my flower girl. There was no colour scheme and I didn't care if the attendants wore matching dresses or suits. The guests were either standing around the chupah or seated at the tables which had been rented for the older people.

My parents led me to the chupah through the crowd. We had a violinist and accordionist play at the wedding and party. I chuckle at some of the things I remember. The only guests I didn't recognize were a close friend of Joe's who had come in from Ottawa with his fiancée, and the backyard neighbours who were standing on their deck, drinking beer and watching the ceremony. For me, the ceremony was perfect.

After our required time alone, Joe and I returned to the crowd. The three speeches were made while everyone was still in the backyard – my father's, my brother who gave the toast to the bride, and of course, Joe's.

After that, the party began. The chupah had been called for 7:30 p.m. It was going to be a cocktail party. The caterer, realizing that "greenes" would be there, said that hors d'oeuvres alone would not be enough, so we also had two carving stations. We later had a beautiful dessert table set up in the dining room and, of course, unlimited booze.

The party was intimate, wonderful, totally spontaneous and fun. The musicians roamed, playing different music depending on the crowd. My friends broke into dance on the patio. Later in the evening when my parents and their friends went down to the basement they sang Yiddish songs accompanied by the musicians.

There were people in every room of the house and our guests moved easily from room to room, from outside to in, mingling, talking and laughing. The last guests left after 2 a.m.

I love simchas – big weddings, small weddings, big and small bar mitzvahs. To share a simchah with family and friends is a joy.

But at that stage in my life on that special day, my wedding was perfect. If I had to do it over again, I still would not change a thing.

Rabbis celebrate 20 years of marriage

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

When Jennifer Gorman was 17, she was voted the girl in her youth group most likely to marry a rabbi.

Well, the prediction came true. She is the wife of Rabbi Sean Gorman, spiritual leader of the Pride of Israel Congregation.

She also ended up becoming a rabbi. Back in high school she had no inkling about her future ordination, because there were no female rabbis yet in the Conservative movement. But Rabbi Jennifer, 45, says she always knew she would work in the Jewish community.

This year, Toronto's first and only rabbinical couple are marking their 20th wedding anniversary. They moved here with their three children (Jesse, 16, Gavriel, 13, and Keren, 11) eight years ago when Rabbi Sean, 44, became an assistant rabbi at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Rabbi Jennifer was offered a position at the United Synagogue Day School, now known as Robbins Hebrew Academy. Today she's the executive director of Mercaz Canada and the Canadian Foundation for Masorti Judaism, the arm of Conservative Judaism in Israel.

She jokes that she is both a rabbi and the rebbetzin. She's also a military wife. Rabbi Sean is a U.S. navy reservist. For the first five years following his ordination he was on active duty as a chaplain.

The couple met in rabbinical school, but they come from very different backgrounds. From age 10 to 18, Rabbi Sean lived on a military base in Norfolk, Va. "I'm a navy brat," he quips.

His father, who is now retired, worked as a boiler technician for naval ships. The rabbi describes the small Jewish community on the base as an "open and friendly" group that would celebrate holidays together. "You would see all different ranks at a holiday meal."

He says the chaplain there inspired him to become a rabbi. "If I had not gone to rabbinical school, I don't think I would have joined the navy."

Rabbi Jennifer grew up in Merrick, N.Y., a town with a very large Jewish population on the south shore of Long Island. She attended Brandeis University, where she studied sociology with a focus on the Jewish community.

Rabbi Sean, a native of New York, was a student at the state university in Buffalo. He met his future wife at the University of Judaism in California where they were both doing the preparatory studies required by the Jewish Theological Seminary. They married while they were still students.

When Rabbi Sean did his military stint, Rabbi Jennifer could not take on permanent work because they never knew how long they would stay in one place. "I was the rabbi at large," she laughs. "When you become a rabbi, Ha Rav, it's always a part of who you are no matter what work you do. You always have the title."

The family was initially stationed at Pearl Harbor in Hawaii, which was a wonderful experience, says the couple. There were a substantial number of Jewish military families, as well as an active community in Honolulu.

But they say the transfer three years later to Lejeune, a major training base on the coast of North Carolina, or "yechupitzville," as Rabbi Jennifer puts it, proved to be a more challenging experience, because they were quite isolated.

There were few young families and many people left the base on weekends so Shabbat was much more of a family affair, she says. "We were lonely." It was at this time that the couple began to look at other career options.

Rabbis Sean and Jennifer Gorman just before their wedding day.

When Rabbi Sean left the navy he took a position in Bellmore, N.Y., a town near Merrick so that they could be closer to their families. By that time his parents were living in New Jersey. Rabbi Jennifer worked at a local Jewish day school.

Rabbi Sean recounts an embarrassing incident on the drive from North Carolina to Bellmore. The family had stopped at a kosher restaurant en route and he happened to have a conversation with a man from Long Island. "He said, 'We heard they got a new rabbi in Bellmore.' And there I was, the new rabbi, in shorts and a T-shirt, unshaven, shlepping all our belongings."

The couple says that being a rabbi or the rebbetzin means you're always on. "When I go to places like the supermarket or the school, I can't run around in sweatpants like other moms," says Rabbi Jennifer. "People do notice."

Bellmore was a transitional home before the couple made a permanent move to Toronto, says Rabbi Sean. He's been at the Pride of Israel since 2009.

Rabbi Jennifer says she and her husband are each other's best friend. "Often we're each other's only sounding board. My strength is the Bible and history. If I have a question about the Law or Talmud, I ask Sean.

"Together we have all the material covered. That's what makes us partners, not just in marriage, but as rabbis as well."

The Wedding Party: Etiquette 101

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

The people you choose to surround you on your wedding day can have a significant impact on your enjoyment of the day, the memories you will take with you and the level of anxiety you will carry on your shoulders until the moment you say "I do."

If you choose wisely and communicate effectively you can reduce some of the wedding stress, and keep your relationships intact. As you select the members of your wedding party, opt for individuals that know you well, who are current and active participants in your lives, and ones you truly care about, says Geneve McNally, a wedding planner with DreamGroup Productions in Vancouver.

"Stay true to yourself, and involve those people who you know are going to support you, not just on your wedding day, but in your marriage and life journey. It makes for a far more authentic and loving wedding experience from start to end."

Brides are often concerned that those who aren't asked to participate in the wedding party will be offended, but that's not necessarily true, says McNally.

"Many times, friends are relieved not to be asked. Often women in their mid-to-late 20s are less concerned about being in a wedding party and more concerned about having a good time at the wedding and ensuring their friend, the bride, is happy," she says. And any potential conflict can easily be resolved with an honest, one-on-one discussion.

It's prudent to get your partner involved in wedding party decision-making, says Alicia Keats, principal planner with Alicia Keats Weddings + Events in Vancouver. "Find out if it's important to him that you both have the same number of attendants, and discuss who you were thinking of asking."

It's not a bad idea to discuss wedding party participants with your family, too, she cautions, particularly if the families are participating in wedding planning or contributing financially.

"By sharing your ideas you can prevent any unanticipated disappointments," she says. "Some parents may have strong feelings about having your sibling(s) in the wedding party and what role they should have."

Whoever you end up selecting, remember that these individuals will charge the atmosphere as you prepare for your wedding day. Keats cautions couples to think about how their wedding party members will affect that atmosphere. "Are they calm and peaceful or loud and energized?"

Our Parisian Engagement Story

Rachel Caplan
Special to The CJN

Rich Lax and I began dating in July, 2004, shortly after meeting at a summer backyard barbeque party, hosted by friends.

Our first date included dinner and a movie, and our relationship blossomed from there.

In December 2010, with Rich working on completing two degrees concurrently in university, mentoring high school students, and coaching a minor hockey league team to the city championship finals, we began planning a trip to meet our Australian friends in Paris. With Rich's busy schedule, it just seemed that there wasn't enough time for him to plan an engagement in 'The City of Love'.

We landed at Charles de Gaulle Airport on Dec. 21 and connected with our good friends whom I had not seen since volunteering together for the Magen David Adom program in Israel over three years earlier.

A few days into our trip, Rich planned for us to visit the Eiffel Tower. When we arrived at the top, our friends oddly began taking an unusual amount of pictures of Rich and me. When I turned to ask Rich why they were photographing us, I found him down on one knee. I was so shocked that I continued to ask him, "Are you serious?" and even exclaimed, "If this is a joke, it's not a funny one."

When Rich pulled out the ring, I knew the proposal was sincere. I immediately burst into a tearful and very expressive, "Yes! Of course I will!" Moments later, as if out of a scene from a movie, the Eiffel Tower's lights began to sparkle as bright as the beautiful diamond ring he had just placed on my finger. It was truly magical.

Rich and I got married on Aug.4 at the Park Hyatt Toronto. We shared our special day with our friends and family from near and far!

Respect your bridal party

While participating in a wedding party is not always time consuming, it can be costly. It's prudent to inform potential participants about that cost up front, so they can decide if it's something they can afford to do.

"Brides need to be open and honest about why they are asking a particular person to be involved and about what the attendant is expected to do over the course of the coming months," McNally says.

"In the same conversation, openly offer the invited person an opportunity to opt out should they feel they don't have the time or money to properly commit. Tell them it's fine if they prefer to support the team from the sidelines instead.

Bridesmaids and groomsmen often agree to participate simply because they didn't know how to say no thank you.

Sometimes the costs involved with the wedding party are borne by the couple, in which case you need to discuss how those costs will impact your budget, Keats advises.

"Are you going to be paying for their outfits, hair and makeup, shoes, spa treatments or golf the morning of the wedding? Be sure to account for the cost of thank you gifts for your bridal party in your wedding budget as well. These costs may end up impacting the size of your wedding party you choose."

McNally has been shocked by the many complaints from frustrated, disappointed bridesmaids over the years, women who are unimpressed with how cavalier and demanding their bride had been. "Remember that bridesmaids and groomsmen are not a right, but a privilege," she cautions. "Don't take them for granted. People are busy, and for some money can be tight. A bride should always be wary of how much she is asking of her wedding party and be respectful and accommodating of schedules."

It's also smart to be aware of the strengths and weakness of your bridesmaids and groomsmen during the wedding planning process, says Keats.

If your wedding party is made up of busy professionals, consider dividing up the planning of the shower and the bachelorette party among the bridesmaids instead of delegating it to the maid of honour alone.

Finally, remember that those who stand beside you on your wedding day are doing so because they love and care for you. Show them you appreciate that, and keep it front of mind. Says Keats:

"I like to think that the group of people standing beside my couples on their wedding day are the people that have supported them throughout their lives, have supported their relationship and will continue to support them in their married life for many years to come."

Intermarriage data from U.S. poll cause stir here

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jewish sociologists and religious leaders are challenging the widely held assumption that Jewish demographic trends here trail the United States by a generation in the wake of a major new poll that found growing rates of intermarriage and assimilation south of the border.

The Pew Research Centre survey of 3,475 U.S. Jews, released Sept. 30, caused a stir among North American Jewish leaders when it was widely reported that it found an intermarriage rate of 58 per cent among American Jews.

American and Canadian communities are different, experts caution

However, the actual Pew finding was 44 per cent, up from 31 per cent in 2001, while the 58 per cent figure referred to Jews who were married between 2000 and 2013. The latter statistic has nevertheless left many worried about what North American Jewry will look like in years to come.

Charles Shahar, chief demographer at Federation CJA in Montreal, said Canadian intermarriage data from the 2011 census won't be available until next month, but projections from the 1991 and 2001 census put the current number at about 27 per cent.

Both he and York University sociologist Randal Schnoor said the common view that it's just a matter of time until Canadian intermarriage rate catches up to the American one is too simplistic, mostly because the Canadian Jewish community is more traditional than its U.S. counterpart.

"In general we are showing similar trends, but I'm not convinced they are going to reach the same levels," Schnoor said.

The 2011 census puts Canada's Jewish population at 391,665, comprising 1.2 per cent of the Canadian population, Shahar said, noting that studies comparable to the Pew findings don't exist in this country and that Canadian Jewish population figures are drawn from census data.

"The intermarriage rate for Canada in 1991... was 16.6 per cent, and in 2001, it was 20.7 per cent. Anything after that is a projection, so for 2011, it was 26.5 per cent, and for 2021, we're projecting that it will be 33.5 per cent," Shahar said.

Shahar said the Toronto and Montreal Jewish communities – which account for 71.4 per cent of the Canadian Jewish population – are unique.

Demand softens for Birthright trips

Amanda Borschel-Dan
Times of Israel

What university student would possibly turn down a chance at a 10-day, most-expense paid vacation to Israel?

Apparently in the United States, they are.

"We know every provider is struggling," says Charlotte Shitrit, trip co-ordinator at Taglit-Birthright Israel provider Sachlav in Jerusalem.

Birthright registration, once a frenzied few-day event with a mile-long waiting list, has been open for more than a month, and U.S. providers such as Sachlav say they are "working hard" to get enough participants for this year's winter tours.

"We're getting there, but across the board, it is quiet, lower than normal.

Air Route Agreement

TORONTO — Canada and Israel have signed an agreement permitting each country to select more scheduled airlines to operate between them. Air Canada currently offers daily flights between the countries, while El Al Israel Airlines operates four weekly flights. Currently, traffic on the Toronto-Tel Aviv route is 130,000 people a year. The deal is expected to boost tourism to Israel, said Israeli Transportation Minister Yisrael Katz.

Rabbis Arrested

NEW YORK — Two Orthodox rabbis and two others were arrested for allegedly kidnapping and beating men in order to force them to grant their wives Jewish divorces. The men were arrested Oct. 9 after a month-long sting operation in which a female FBI agent posed as an Orthodox woman trying to get a get from her husband. Rabbis Mendel Epstein and Martin Wolmark were arrested along with two alleged accomplices. The arrests were reportedly accompanied by a series of FBI searches, including one at a Monsey, N.Y., yeshiva, as well as in Lakewood, N.J., Brooklyn, N.Y., and elsewhere. The rabbis allegedly charged $10,000 to persuade a beit din to approve a kidnapping, and up to $60,000 to pay for others to handle the kidnapping, beating and other physical torture. Rabbi Epstein is reportedly a divorce mediator in the Orthodox community.

Yellen To Head Fed

WASHINGTON — Janet Yellen, vice-chair of the U.S. Federal Reserve, was named the central bank's chair, the first woman to be nominated for the post, President Barack Obama announced Oct. 9. If confirmed by the Senate, Yellen would succeed Ben Bernanke and be the third straight Jewish economist to head the Federal Reserve. Bernanke, who steps down in January after serving since February 2006, succeeded Alan Greenspan. Yellen is married to George Akerlof, a 2001 Nobel economics laureate.

YU Hires Pedophile

NEW YORK — Yeshiva University hired a new faculty member who was convicted of inappropriate sexual behaviour with boys, the Forward reported. The university, which is facing a major lawsuit concerning its handling of allegations of sexual abuse over several decades, has hired Akiva Roth, who pleaded guilty in 1997 to four counts of lewdness against several boys he tutored. Roth, 42, began teaching Hebrew at YU this fall. A spokesperson told the paper that YU "has policies and procedures in place that require background checks for new hires" and is "currently in the process of thoroughly exploring the matter you brought to our attention."After pleading guilty, Roth got 10 years probation.

Seminary Chooses New Head

PHILADELPHIA — The Reconstructionist Rabbinical College has selected Rabbi Deborah Waxman, a historian of American Judaism, as its new president.

Rabbi Deborah Waxman

Rabbi Waxman, vice-president of governance at the Philadelphia-area seminary, will head the school and the movement's congregational union, an umbrella for some 100 shuls. She's believed to be the first woman and first lesbian to lead a congregational union or seminary affiliated with one of the Jewish denominations.

She'll replace Rabbi Dan Ehrenkrantz, who has served as president since 2002. Rabbi Waxman, who holds a PhD in American Jewish history from Temple University, starts her new post Jan. 1.

Her partner, Christine Ager, is a convert to Judaism.

Guide dog fundraiser an eye-opening experience

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

As I was led into the pitch-black dining room to take my seat for lunch, I began feeling a bit uneasy. I had never before eaten a meal in complete darkness, with no idea of the menu, and I was anxious about the experience.

I was one of 50 people who attended Lunching in the Dark on Oct. 6 at O'Noir restaurant in downtown Toronto. The event raised $10,000 for the Israel Guide Dog Center for the Blind (IGDCB), a non-profit organization supported almost entirely by donations.

"We wanted people to experience for one hour the feeling of eating in the dark and put themselves in the position of a visually impaired or blind person while they eat," said Sara Gabriel, executive director of the Canadian Friends of IGDCB.

"It is very difficult for a person who is blessed with sight to grasp what a blind person has to go through in order to live as normal a life as possible."

After I accidentally knocked over my glass of water and the woman sitting across from me spilled her drink on me, I quickly realized how easy it is to take our senses for granted. Being deprived of sight is uncomfortable and challenging, especially when no assistance is available.

Natalie Urbach, left, and Sara Gabriel

While I nibbled on my salad, afraid to attempt to pour dressing on my plate, I began to really appreciate the work that the IGDCB does to help blind people in Israel achieve independence and mobility.

The IGDCB is the only accredited centre in the Middle East that breeds, raises and trains dogs to become guides and creates a partnership with visually impaired or blind Israelis.

Training costs for a guide dog, from the moment of birth until it leaves the centre with a blind Israeli, are approximately $25,000. The blind person receives the guide dog, instruction and regular home visits during the working life of the dog at no charge.

"When we started here in Canada eight years ago, thanks to our founding chairman, Dr. Morris Samson, we were practically unknown," Gabriel said. "Today, we have grown exponentially thanks to the community. Its generosity and support have made it possible for us to sponsor, in the last five years, 36 partnerships. As well, we have provided the funds for six blind people and their guide dogs to participate in last year's March of the Living."

Aside from individual donations, Gabriel said the IGDCB offers students an opportunity to sponsor puppies for their bar and bat mitzvah projects or class tzedakah campaigns.

Can the world trust Iran's 'confidence-building' moves?

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

This column went to press approximately one week before the nuclear talks between the P5+1 (the permanent United Nations Security Council members plus Germany) and Iran were scheduled to get underway in Geneva on Oct. 15.

There has been a great deal of discussion in media and policy circles about what will be required to ensure that Iran doesn't use the talks merely as a pretext to drag out a process to allow it to continue illicitly enriching nuclear fuel as it moves ahead to what most experts agree is the pursuit of a nuclear bomb.

Deception is nothing new to Iranian nuclear negotiators. As noted in last week's column, when current Iranian President Hassan Rouhani was in charge of negotiations between 2003 and 2005, he bragged to his own leadership about advancing nuclear enrichment at Isfahan while talks went on with the Europeans who believed, by agreement, that all enrichment activity had ceased. On Oct. 6, the Times of Israel reported that in May – just weeks before being elected president – Rouhani gave an interview to Iran's state TV in which he boasted about this same deception.

According to the Times, Rouhani detailed how, in 2003, Iran flagrantly violated what was known as the "Tehran Declaration" which, Rouhani said, "was supposed to outline how everything should be suspended."

The Times continued: "Rouhani told the interviewer that all Iran did was merely suspend '10 centrifuges' in the Natanz enrichment facility. 'And not a total suspension. Just reduced the yield'" while keeping the Isfahan facility running (as noted above). Rouhani then pushed ahead the following year with a heavy-water reactor at Arak.

In short, the Europeans were systematically misled.

Yet there was Rouhani, speaking at the UN last month promising "to engage immediately in time-bound and result-oriented talks" over the nuclear program, "to build mutual confidence and removal of mutual uncertainties with full transparency."

An Oct. 7 AFP story drew attention to the last round of talks held (in April) in Almaty, Kazakhstan. At the time, the P5+1 "proposed Iran suspend uranium enrichment at the 20 per cent level it says it needs for a medical research reactor, and to halt enrichment at its underground plant at Fordo. In return, they would ease some sanctions on trade in gold and petrochemicals."

Although it indicated a willingness to pursue future talks, Iran in effect rejected the Almaty offer even though it would have meant some sanctions relief.

Yet, in Indonesia on Oct. 7, as if to preserve some optimism, U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry said: "The group of six put a proposal on the table at Almaty and I don't believe as of yet Iran has fully responded to that particular proposal. So I think we are waiting for the fullness of the Iranian difference in their approach now."

Even stranger is the fact that, on Oct. 6, Iran's foreign minister declared that the Almaty offers are "history" and that the major powers "should come to the negotiating table with a new approach."

Kerry now insists that "what we need are a set of proposals from Iran that will fully disclose how they will show the world that their program is peaceful." To many analysts, that means that Iran would not be able to enrich beyond 3.5 per cent. (Israel would like to see no enrichment allowed at all, but it stands alone with that demand.)

The Washington Institute's managing director, Michael Singh, wrote in Foreign Policy that, despite crippling economic sanctions, "Rouhani will surely seek to alleviate Iran's suffering at the minimum price to its nuclear options, offering transparency and confidence-building rather than far-reaching limits on Iran's nuclear activities. The United States is susceptible to such arguments, as Washington wants not just to reach a nuclear agreement, but to ease hostilities with Iran, and it is worried that the chance to do so may be fleeting.

"But a limited nuclear agreement that leaves Iranian capabilities in place, even if subject to enhanced inspections, will not build confidence or stability," Singh added.

We may soon find out.

GRASSROOTS TZEDAKAH

A group of Robbins Hebrew Academy Grade 3 boys recently decided to hold a fundraiser for the school. They created their own signs, made all the arrangements and set up their RHA Café in front of one of their homes. The boys, seen here with some of their siblings, served a variety of goodies and raised $150 for the school.

A clear message to the world

Guest Editorial

Regardless of one's political predilections, one's attitude toward the policies of Israel's current government, or one's view of Benjamin Netanyahu's strengths and weaknesses as a retail politician, one has to admire the Israeli prime minister's ability to make his point.

His speech before the United Nations General Assembly in 2012 will long be remembered for his drawing of a bomb that appeared to come straight out of a Roadrunner cartoon. He was trying to stress that Iran was, and is, edging ever closer to being able to produce a nuclear weapon – a clear existential threat to the world's only Jewish state.

This year, as the newly elected, ostensibly "moderate" and apparently charm-laden Iranian president, Hassan Rouhani, embarked on a public relations blitz aimed at western media and western leaders, Netanyahu came to New York and gave an equally memorable, if slightly less flamboyant, speech.

He warned the global community in no uncertain terms that Israel cannot stomach a nuclear Iran.

"Israel will not allow Iran to get nuclear weapons," Netanyahu said in his Oct. 1 address, the last by a world leader at this year's opening of the General Assembly. "If Israel is forced to stand alone, Israel will stand alone, but in standing alone, Israel will know we are defending many, many others."

He also warned against trusting Rouhani to keep his word when he promises full transparency on the nuclear file.

"When it comes to Iran's nuclear weapons program, here's my advice: distrust, dismantle and verify," Netanyahu said.

Given Iran's and Rouhani's intertwined and obfuscatory track records on the issue, this is wise counsel.

As Paul Michaels details in his According to Reports column this week, Rouhani boasted to Iranian TV as recently as last May about how, in 2003, Iran misled the international community on the activities of its nuclear program.

While it may be possible that Netanyahu was doing U.S. President Barack Obama a favour by playing the bad cop to Obama's more benevolent persona, Israel can't afford to take Rouhani at his word, nor can it rely on the United States or the global community to defend it.

And lest anyone think otherwise, it's not warmongering to inform the world that Israel can't afford to trust the extremist Islamic Republic to act rationally, never mind responsibly, with a stockpile of nuclear weapons.

Israel cannot sit idly by and wait, even if an attack on Iran carries heavy risks. One nuclear strike could – and most likely would – be devastating to a small country with a highly concentrated population.

And even if one's politics – domestically or in relation to the Middle East – don't lean to the right, it's hard not to admire the Harper government's strong and consistent stand in support of Israel.

This was fully in evidence when Foreign Minister John Baird expressed his own skepticism about Iran's nuclear ambitions to the General Assembly Sept. 30.

Such a stand in support of Israel doesn't appear to buy the Canadian government much political capital, and in fact may come at a cost. But its attitude seems to be that the truth isn't a popularity contest. And like Netanyahu's own chutzpadik speech, it was a brave stand to take.

Exhibit caused too much damage

Last year, the downtown Hamilton Public Library ran an exhibit in its main lobby called "A Child's View From Gaza." It featured drawings, supposedly by children, of Israeli planes bombing Palestinian homes. An accompanying written commentary described in graphic detail how Israelis allegedly abuse Palestinians.

After thousands of library patrons had passed the exhibit, the Hamilton Jewish Federation's public relations committee persuaded the library to move the exhibit to the less visible fourth floor. Recently the library CEO offered an apology for "the hurt [the exhibit] caused the Jewish community." He offered no apology for authorizing this repugnant exhibition.

The library has agreed to allow the committee to sponsor an exhibit, Oct 1 to 15, showing how Israel does humanitarian work throughout the world. Unfortunately, it is highly unlikely that the positive message of the Israel-aid display will erase the intensely negative impact generated by the Gaza "art" exhibit, one reason being that the Israel-aid display is on library's virtually deserted fourth floor.

The committee was remiss in not taking stronger action against the Gaza art exhibit when it was first featured last year. Its questionable "compromise deal" with the library is not a satisfactory resolution to this distressing issue.

Diaspora Jews are not inferior

In his column "Mitzvot mean more in Israel" (The CJN, Oct. 3), Rabbi Ilan Acoca discusses the religious importance for Jews to live in Israel. To stress his point, he refers to the Torah and the sages from which he draws the conclusion that "only in Israel is the worship of God pure without any barriers or impurities." He concludes with the statement, "In the land of Israel, we're a living people. In the Diaspora, we're like bodies lacking spirit – the physical shell of a people without inner life."

This is insulting to all Jews, religious or otherwise. Neither I, my family, friends nor the vast majority of Jews who don't live in Israel share this sense of inferiority. If the good rabbi feels so empty inside, I suggest he make aliyah as soon as possible.

Deuteronomy isn't dreary or boring

In her column ("What we've got that robots don't" The CJN, Aug. 29), Jean Gerber writes that Deuteronomy is "dreary," "boring" and has "too many admonitions."

No, Deuteronomy is the most absorbing book of the Pentateuch. Many of the ethical mitzvot are found in Deuteronomy. There are resonant teachings such as "justice, justice you shall pursue" (Deuteronomy 16:20) and, "See, I have set before you this day life and death, and good and evil... therefore choose life" (Deuteronomy 30:15 and Deuteronomy 30:19).

Indeed, Deuteronomy (31:19) describes the Torah (Pentateuch) as a shirah (a poem or song). The book portrays the great leader Moses' love of the Jewish nation. Gerber is right that there are too many rebukes, especially the curses that outnumber the blessings in Deuteronomy chapters 27 and 28. But is this not true to life, where we are swamped today with warnings about hazards that will affect our environment and health if we don't obey the rules?

Rouhani and Putin share PR strategy

So, Iranian President Hassan Rouhani thrills U.S. President Barack Obama and others by condemning the Holocaust ("Rouhani PR blitz masks lies" The CJN, Oct. 3). Wow! Next he might even shock the world by saying that Hitler was an evil monster. What really matters is whether he condemns President Bashar Assad of Syria for murdering more than 100,000 Syrian civilians and for gassing hundreds, including more than 400 children? Will he stop funding terrorist organizations such as Hamas and Hezbollah, or are they not quite as bad as the Nazis? When he renounces the current evils that his government supports, then he will be worth listening to. I think he retained the same public relations firm as did Russia's President Vladimir Putin.

Should the Diaspora get a say in Israeli affairs?

Not on life-and-death issues

David Koschitzky

What does it mean for mainstream Diaspora community organizations to support Israel today? To blindly defend every policy decision of the Israeli government? Of course not. It means understanding the distinction between "advocating" for Israel and "engaging" with Israel.

Advocating for Israel means enhancing the understanding and support for Israel with a wide range of audiences – government, media, the Jewish community, other ethno-cultural communities, business and academic centres. This means explaining to all parties Israel's long-sought goals of achieving peace with its Arab neighbours and with the Palestinians, along with acceptance and security for the Jewish state.

Explaining these goals is not a politically partisan act. It's an accurate reflection – against persistent denials or distortions by Israel's many detractors – of what successive Israeli governments and the overwhelming majority of Israelis want to see.

Engaging with Israel is entirely different and perhaps more ambiguous. It invites the question: what, if any, are the proper limits of the Diaspora engagement with Israel? On issues such as religious pluralism and tolerance, rabbinic authority, Jewish identity – subjects that indeed significantly affect Jewish communities in the Diaspora – engagement is entirely appropriate for all Jews.

However, on matters concerning life-and-death decisions that mostly directly affect only Israelis and are already part of Israelis' daily internal debate, there are valid reasons to ask to what degree do Jews in the Diaspora have the right to weigh in, especially when their own lives are not on the line.

Prominent Los Angeles Rabbi David Wolpe addressed this issue in response to U.S. academic and journalist Peter Beinart's critique of the American Jewish establishment when he wrote: "My children do not patrol [Israel's] borders. They do not dismantle unexploded rockets. They do not walk gingerly into cafes, always wondering, always fearful, even in quiet times. There aren't too many bomb shelters in Westwood [Calif.]. When I express my opinions about Israel's conduct, which I do, this reality is foremost in my mind. There is a penalty for choosing not to live in Israel: a certain diffidence, a willingness to listen and appreciate the result of a democratic process, even when one disagrees with the result."

Speaking out in support of the principle of a two-state vision that preserves Israel as a Jewish and democratic country, and is the stated policy of successive elected Israeli democratic governments,

All Jews should have a voice

Arie Ralf

Last June, the heads of the Jewish People Policy Institute, an Israeli-based think-tank whose analysts include veteran U.S. diplomat Dennis Ross and former U.S. undersecretary of state Stuart Eizenstat, presented their annual report to the Israeli government. In it, they called on the government to engage Diaspora Jews, since "Diaspora Jews deserve a say in Israeli decision-making and should be heard and consulted on matters that could affect Jewish communities worldwide."

Missing in the report is one word – "all" – since virtually all Diaspora Jews love Israel and can help right its wrongs. It is, therefore, in Israel's interest to hear all voices in the Diaspora.

For the majority of Jews in the Diaspora, the current reality in Israel presents a significant challenge to the image of the Jewish state they grew up with and to the relationship they would like to maintain with Israel. Many feel it's the duty and responsibility of the Israeli government to hear all views in the Diaspora, and that since we have Israel's back, we also need to have Israel's ear in order to tell it the hard truths that it needs to hear. Self-appointed Diaspora Jewish organizations, representing a vocal, right-wing minority, claim to express all views, but they do not.

Support for Israel doesn't mean blanket approval of its government's actions. If you say that in order to be a supporter of Israel you must agree with all of its policies, you're going to alienate millions of people who think of themselves as active Israel supporters.

It's not easy for all Diaspora Jews to automatically support, lobby for and defend misguided policies of the Israeli government. There must be a reciprocal arrangement. A one-way street isn't going to work with the younger generation. Israel needs to secure the support of the next Jewish generation through continued political advocacy, donations, human capital and enthusiasm. All are critical. Make no mistake: the future of the Diaspora Jewish community and the State of Israel are contingent on securing the involvement and support of Jews who can engage in critical conversations about Israel with confidence and conviction.

Israel will endure and remain relevant to both Israelis and to Jews around the world if it can be defended not only militarily, but also morally – by our generation and by future generations. The attempt to silence leftists and human rights groups with the claim that we are harmful to Israel's good name and are "damaging Israel's legitimacy" or that we are "anti-Zionist" is both insulting and dangerous.

A positive sign from the Zionist left

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Ameinu, a Jewish organization that supports "progressive causes in Israel," has taken a refreshing and long-overdue step in naming, shaming and pushing back against hard-core anti-Zionists. In a publication titled The Third Narrative: Progressive Answers to the Far Left's Critiques of Israel, Ameinu condemns the "relentless barrage of accusations against Israel on the web, on campus and in other settings."

This notably harsh language is fully justified. For many years, liberal values and moral causes have been exploited for immoral political warfare against Israel, including boycott campaigns and false accusations of "apartheid." Fundamental principles such as human rights, peace, and democracy are cynically abused in distinctly anti-progressive and anti-liberal attacks that demonize Israel as the nation-state of the Jewish People.

Ameinu's counter-offensive is particularly important for Jewish students who are naturally sympathetic to the language and appeal of social justice, but have little knowledge of the history and facts, and are easily brainwashed. Many well-intentioned liberals are taken in by a well-financed network of self-proclaimed human rights groups obsessed with hatred of Israel, and by marginal individuals who misappropriate the Jewish framework of "tikkun olam" (repairing the world). The discredited Goldstone report, published in 2009, whose false claims caused major damage, demonstrated the destructive influence of this network of non-governmental organizations (NGOs).

The radical anti-Zionist left also promotes what is euphemistically referred to as a "bi-national solution," and invents legal arguments, such as a "right of return" for millions of Palestinians who claim refugee status. Both concepts have no substantive foundation and are the equivalent of wiping Israel off the map.

This political warfare goes far beyond criticism of occupation and settlements, and debates on Israel's policies on the complexities of borders, Palestinian terrorism, and security. In launching their campaign to counter the radical left, Ameinu's leaders recognize that the use of terms such as apartheid, accompanied by systematic discrimination against the Jewish homeland, and boycott campaigns are designed to roll back the clock to 1948 and delegitimize Israel, regardless of borders. As many Israelis have long known, this means that even with a peace agreement, the hatred and mass terror would continue, nullifying benefits from concessions required for a two-state solution.

In what it calls "The Third Narrative initiative," Ameinu seeks "to engage people on the left who appreciate informed and passionate objections to Israeli policies and behaviour... but also suspect that it is wrong to lay all blame for the conflict at the feet of Israelis." On this basis, Ameinu is providing tools "to combat unfair or inaccurate attacks on Israel."

This is an agenda that goes beyond the simple-minded ideological barriers that have been created within the Zionist movement and highly destructive attacks from the left on the right, and visa versa. Internal ideological warfare, which is also (and in some cases, primarily) a power struggle involving individuals seeking to expand their own importance, has severely impeded the counter-attack against demonization. Instead of co-operating against a common threat, officials from other "progressive" organizations claiming to "love Israel" have been silent in the face of loathing, hatred and intolerance.

While repeating the slogans of human rights, these organizations do not organize protests in front of United Nations meetings that ignore Syrian war crimes, and instead continue to promote blood libels against Israel. In contrast, Ameinu has joined other groups in fighting the exhaustive battles over "Israeli apartheid week" on campus, as well as boycotts, divestment and sanctions, and other ugly expressions of modern anti-Semitism.

In its initiative, Ameinu asks, "Do you know a student who could use our support when confronted with charges of 'Israel is an apartheid state' or that 'Israel has committed ethnic cleansing?' Do you have neighbours or coworkers asking difficult questions about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict?" The same questions are asked by Zionists on the right, as well as the majority of rational centrists – on this issue, there are no political divisions.

If the more powerful groups on the Jewish left would follow this lead and act on their own liberal principles, these attacks could be defeated.

Remembering Rabin becomes less partisan

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

Eighteen years have passed since that dreadful Saturday evening in November 1995, when Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin was murdered while leaving Tel Aviv's Malchei Yisrael Square (now Rabin Square). Three shots in the back – just moments after a rally in support of the Israeli–Palestinian peace process. Rabin had been the main speaker and bashfully sang a stanza of Yankele Rotblit's Shir HaShalom (Song of Peace), together with the song's most famous performer, Miri Aloni.

The tremors of that historic event were felt not only in Israel, but across the globe, but they were short-lived. Just over 1-1/2 years later, in May 1996, Shimon Peres, Rabin's partner in leading Israel's efforts toward peace with the Palestinians and his replacement as prime minister, was, astonishingly, defeated by Benjamin Netanyahu in national elections, with over 60 per cent of the Jewish population voting for the latter.

For those in the peace camp, that result was painfully disturbing. Many believed Netanyahu had an at least indirect hand in inciting hatred toward Rabin. They remembered his speech at a different rally, at Zion Square in downtown Jerusalem, in October 1995, where some of the demonstrators held posters of Rabin dressed in an SS uniform, while others shouted "Death to Rabin" and condemned him as a traitor.

Ever since, a debate has been ongoing about how we should observe the yearly anniversary of Rabin's assassination. For more than a decade, those on the left couldn't stomach a commemoration of the tragedy at which Rabin's erstwhile political rivals and their supporters would also take part. They believed, and some still believe, that their rivals were at least partly responsible for Rabin's murder. And they wanted these commemorations to make a statement of continued support for the peace process in which Rabin had been so central.

Those on the right have felt excluded and unwanted at these events. In 1997, Natan Sharansky, then a minister in Netanyahu's government, spoke at the remembrance and was loudly booed. Half the nation felt they were being accused of Rabin's murder because they didn't support his policies. And more than anything else, they felt Rabin's murder and its commemoration were being exploited by the left for political purposes – that instead of emphasizing the need to protect and fortify Israel's democracy to ensure nothing like Rabin's murder could ever happen again, the yearly event was glorifying the peace process, which they could not identify with.

The last couple of years have seen a change, with attempts to make the annual event more inclusive. Youth movements and other groups from across the spectrum have been taking part. Left and right. Religious and secular. Jewish and Arab. Organizers call upon those who take part "to remember the murder" and "to struggle for our democracy."

Last year, organizers were criticized from both the right and the left. Rightist extremists complained that people who took part were, in fact, supporting Rabin's left-leaning policies. Those on the left continued to believe that not enough was being said to promote and advance the peace process.

For many years, I, too, felt the yearly event should be used to memorialize Rabin's legacy of peace. But as with so many other things in life, time is a great equalizer. Things change. Netanyahu's government is presently engaged in talks with the Palestinians. In the wake of the Arab Spring, or whatever one might call it, our neck of the woods has become even more complex. And extremists, mostly on the right, are increasingly turning to undemocratic means, such as "price tag" attacks on Arabs and others with whom they disagree.

In this milieu, an inclusive commemoration of Rabin's murder where a large swath of Israeli society is represented – and supporting only democratic means for bringing about change, even difficult change – is a positive step forward and something Rabin himself would have welcomed.

There's another thing I'm quite certain about: Rabin's murder changed the course of our history. He was the only leader of our times with the political and military credentials and the personal courage necessary to move the peace process forward. Had he not been murdered, the Middle East would look quite different today. Unfortunately, Rabin's murderer achieved what he set out to do.

May Rabin be of blessed memory, and may we be blessed with another leader of his stature – soon.

Anne Frank's stepsister recalls a 'very lively girl'

Holocaust survivor Eva Schloss was in Toronto last week to share stories about her two-year friendship with Holocaust icon Anne Frank, who later became her stepsister posthumously.

"I was born in Vienna, and when the Nazis came in 1938, we were lucky enough to get out of the country," said Schloss, the keynote speaker for Uptown Chabad's annual gala fundraiser that honoured Jewish community leaders and Uptown Chabad founders Alan and Sheila Mostyn.

Eva Schloss

Sitting across from CHIN radio host Zelda Young, who interviewed her about her experiences, Schloss captivated about 300 people at the Ontario Science Centre with her stories.

Following the Nazi invasion, Schloss, nee Geiringer, and her family moved to Belgium before settling in Amsterdam in 1940 in an apartment opposite the Frank's home.

"All the children would play in the street, and one day a little girl introduced herself as Anne Frank and she took me up to her apartment to meet her family, her sister, Margot, her mother, Edith, and father, Otto – not realizing of course that he would later become my stepfather," Schloss said.

Schloss' mother, Elfreide Geiringer, and Anne's father, Otto Frank, both of whom lost their spouses in the Holocaust, reconnected after the war and fell in love. They married in 1953, a year after Schloss wed an Israeli man named Zvi and settled in London to raise a family.

Recalling the precocious girl who was just one month older than her, Schloss revealed details about Anne that painted her as a boy-crazy attention-seeker with a huge personality.

"She was a big, big chatterbox. At school she was called Mrs. Quack-Quack. She never stopped talking," she said.

"We had steps outside our apartment and she often sat on top of them and always wanted a whole crowd of children around her. She had a shoulder that she could get out of joint and she would demonstrate like a circus artist… She was quite funny," Schloss recalled.

"At 11 she was already interested in boys… She was a very lively girl, a real girl-girl, she said.

Shortly after the Nazis invaded the Netherlands in 1942, Anne's older sister, Margot, and Schloss' older brother, Heinz, received deportation orders to Germany.

Both families decided separately to go into hiding and both families managed to stay hidden for two years before being betrayed and sent to Auschwitz.

"When we arrived, the men and women were separated, and after that I never saw [my brother]," she said.

She did, however, have chance meetings with her father, which "was really amazing, because after the selection, we had no idea what happened to them."

In the nine months Schloss and her mother were imprisoned in the death camp, they managed to stick together for all but three of them.

"One day, we went into the showers and when we came out, we saw Dr. Mengele – or as he was called, Dr. Death, because he decided who was going to live and who was going to die – and a selection was taking place. And as every mother would do, she was giving me part of her bread rations and she had become very, very weak."

Mengele noticed her mother's fragile state and selected her and about 40 other women to be gassed. "For three months I thought I had lost her."

Although she didn't elaborate, in another interview last April with a Dublin radio station, she said that her mother and other "condemned women" were sent to another barrack, where she ran into her cousin from Prague who was working in the camp hospital.

"After my mother was selected, she asked Mengele to look her over again [and convinced him that] she could still work."

Three months later, they were reunited and stayed together until Auschwitz was liberated by the Russians in January 1945.

Schloss' father and brother didn't survive. Neither did Otto Frank's family.

When Miep Gies – an employee and friend of the Franks who helped them while they were hiding – learned about Anne's fate, she contacted Otto Frank.

"After [the Franks] were arrested, [Gies] went upstairs to clear the attic, and she found all the loose pages on the ground. She knew that Anne was writing a diary and she picked it up and put it in her desk… When she learned that Anne was not coming back, she gave it to Otto," Schloss said.

Since The Diary of Anne Frank was published in 1947, it's been translated into more than 70 languages, adapted into plays and films, and read by millions.

"Anne wrote in her diary, 'When I die, I would like to live on,' and she does, because everyone knows about her," Schloss said.

BETTER

Ambassador concerned over online anti-Semitism

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

In a meeting with a couple of reporters from the Jewish press, Israeli diplomat Gideon Behar posed a challenge: Google the word "Jew" and search in YouTube. See what you find.

Well, a Google search turned up a series of pretty benign websites about Jews, but the opening list on YouTube revealed a host of videos that were hostile to Jews in varying degrees. There was a scene from the 1990 film Europa Europa in which a lecturer standing in front of a swastika flag explains to a group of young Nazis how to spot a Jew. You can imagine how complimentary that was.

Gideon Behar

Then there's a scene from the movie Borat, titled "Throw a Jew down the well." Comedy, yes, but on its own and if you didn't know any better...

Another video is of "ex-Jew Benjamin Freedman" who exposes the so-called Zionist agenda while in the background, film of Nazi leaders runs. Another video purports to describe the Jewish treatment of Christians in Israel. At the top of the list is a game-show spoof hosted by Howard Stern called "Guess who's a Jew," that includes an SS contestant as well as a KKK member spewing racist vitriol.

Not a neutral or complimentary search result among them.

And that's Behar's point. The Internet and other media have become forums where anti-Jewish content can easily be found.

"It's the real world today," he said. "Kids live on the Internet."

"There is a rise in anti-Semitism and hate speech on the Internet."

Behar is director of the department for combating anti-Semitism at Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs. He was in Toronto last week as head of the country's delegation to the semi-annual plenary meeting of the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance (IHRA). The IHRA consists of 31 member countries and is mandated to keep alive the memory of the Holocaust and promote anti-racist education.

That's important in the face of Holocaust-denial, Behar stated. Denial of the Holocaust is increasingly widespread in the Arab and Muslim world, in European countries and on the Internet.

There's data to back him up. A report published earlier this year by Tel Aviv University's Kantor Center for the Study of Contemporary European Jewry found that incidents of anti-Semitism jumped by 30 per cent in 2012 over the year before.

The study found there were 686 acts of violence and vandalism, with the largest single number, 200, recorded in France. The attack on a Toulouse Jewish school and the murder of a rabbi and four children emboldened extremist elements, said European Jewish Congress President Moshe Kantor.

The work of anti-racist activists is far from done, Behar suggested. Europe is experiencing a resurgence of anti-Semitism, much of it home-grown, but "many are coming to Europe from the Middle East and North Africa. They come with propaganda and ideas about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, and they don't differentiate between Israel and Jews." In Europe, he added, they see Jews as the enemy.

The Internet contains a lot of anti-Semitic material in languages that are spoken in the Middle East, said Behar, who speaks eight languages, including several Arabic dialects.

"[They] put the seeds of hatred in the hearts of millions of people around the world without accurate information to contradict it," he stated.

"The radicals and anti-Semites behind it [hope] to create such a huge rift between Jews and Muslims that you will never be able to budge it."

As for the Holocaust, Behar said it was a unique event, but with lessons for the entire world. While acknowledging it didn't prompt nations to stop subsequent genocides in Cambodia and Africa, it did lead "to an agenda to give asylum to persecuted peoples."

Today, Iran stands at the forefront of efforts to minimize the Holocaust's significance. "Iran is the only country with a government policy of Holocaust denial and anti-Semitism," Behar said.

Not only did it host an international conference in 2006 to deny the Holocaust, it has held online contests soliciting Holocaust-denying cartoons, and an international book fair in Tehran features hundreds of Holocaust-denial and anti-Semitic titles.

That's something western governments must be made aware of, and Iranians must be confronted with whenever they deny the Holocaust, he said.

Despite his rather gloomy assessment, Behar believes most people have no preconceived ideas about Jews one way or the other, but are influenced by what they read in the media. Jews must get involved in community life and present an alternative picture to the stereotypes they've read, he said.

In circumstances where anti-Semitism is found online, Behar said, "Don't leave it." Complain to the web host, cite their own terms of use to get it removed.

"Things can be done. Students can be very active in this field," he said.

"The message is that each one of us has power today, and we have to be active."

Peter Beinart speaks to left-wing Zionist group

JSpaceCanada holds inaugural conference

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

Israel's creation has been a blessing and sometimes people on the left don't make that explicit enough, says Peter Beinart, associate professor of journalism and political science at the City University of New York and the author of The Crisis of Zionism

"Democracy is not the whole of the Zionist dream. Israel is not and, in my opinion should not, be a secular democracy like Canada and the United States," Beinart said at the inaugural conference of the new progressive Zionist group JSpaceCanada, held Oct. 6 at the University of Toronto.

"But if democracy is not the entirety of the Zionist dream, it is necessary to the Zionist dream."

The controversial Beinart – who advocates what he calls a "Zionist BDS," a boycott of goods made in the West Bank – explained that some of Israel's policies, such as its control of the West Bank, are contrary to the democratic vision of Israel's founders and place its democracy and security in peril.

Peter Beinart

He noted that that the portion of Israel's budget going toward settlements has doubled during Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's time in office.

While he admitted that Palestinians must share some of the blame for the failure of the peace process, calling terrorism "unforgivable," he put the onus on the Israeli government, which he said is "paying Israelis to move into the West Bank."

"It's not enough to say Israel will get a handle on settlement growth when the Palestinians finally decide to live in peace in a two-state solution," Beinart said. "Because by supporting settlement growth, you're pushing Palestinians in exactly the direction we don't want them to go."

JSpaceCanada was launched officially in 2011, although the idea for it was conceived three years ago. The goal of its founders was to support Israel while also supporting a two-state solution for two peoples and encourage open dialogue about the state, its actions and its future.

They say they also wanted to fill a gap in the Canadian Jewish community by providing a pro-Israel, pro-peace voice that's an alternative to the extremes often found on both sides of the debate.

"It is out of a love for Israel and our genuine concern for its long term security and survival that JSpaceCanada was founded, and why we are gathered here today," said conference co-chair Karen Mock a former CEO of the Canadian Race Relations Foundation and a former national director of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights.

"But we are here to reaffirm that it's appropriate to ask difficult questions and to have the courageous conversations both within our Jewish community and between us and the wider communities."

The conference, held at U of T's Multi-Faith Centre, brought together a variety of provocative speakers and panelists.

The aim, Mock said, was to "broaden the conversation" about Israel and its policies and discuss what can be done to ignite activism in today's youth and offer a voice that falls between the "extreme left" and "staunch right."

"[It's about] building bridges and dialogue spaces," said Jenny Isaacs, an active member of All That's Left, an Israeli collective devoted to "building a just society in Israel and Palestine."

Mock said there's a strong desire in the Canadian pro-Israel community to have a more open dialogue on Israel's policies without fear of being labelled anti-Israel.

"JSpace is for those who love Israel and want her to thrive and survive in safety and security and peace as a Jewish homeland, with human rights and social justice for all her residents," Mock said.

"There is a space in JSpace for everyone."

Dutch families honoured for rescuing Jews

Jordan Adler
Special to The CJN

The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem honoured two Dutch families posthumously Oct. 8 for rescuing and sheltering Jews during the Holocaust.

The descendents of Gert Jan Kottelenberg, his brother, Jan, and his wife, Hermina, and the children and grandchildren of Bob and Maria de Jongh received a Righteous Among the Nations medal and certificate on behalf of their families at a dinner in Toronto.

The Kottelenberg and de Jongh families also united with the descendants of the Jews who their parents and grandparents rescued.

Vera Hartog, who found refuge in the de Jongh household when she was just 12, was at the dinner. She recalled living with the family and their children from April 1944 to the end of the war.

"It was the first time I was alone," Hartog said, after her mother died of cancer and another family took in her sister, Fenna. "During a short time, I was brought to different addresses and all friendly people. I was crying most of the time."

"[Bob de Jongh] was looking for a more permanent address for me. And he asked me if I wanted to be in a family with children. I jumped and shouted, 'Oh yes! A family with children!'"

The Kottelenberg children were united with the first- and second-generation descendants of Julius Zion, whom the Kottelenbergs hid on their farm.

In the fall of 1942, the Kottelenbergs, who were members of the Dutch Underground, took in Julius, his sister Johanna and her fiancé, Istvan.

Although the Nazis apprehended Johanna, Istvan and their baby – who were later murdered at the Sobibor extermination camp – Julius fled the home before the Germans arrived.

He hid under a nearby bridge until it was dark and then walked back to his hometown, Eibergen. He lived there until his death in 1990, at age 85.

"As families, we value Yad Vashem's award on their work performed 70 years ago because it has tremendous teaching value for the generations to come," Bernie Kottelenberg said. "We didn't all have a chance to know our grandfathers [Gert Jan and Jan], but their faith and convictions have been passed on."

The Kottelenbergs and de Jonghs are among 24,811 individuals from 47 countries who have been awarded the title of Righteous Among the Nations.

The dinner was co-sponsored by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem and the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance (IHRA). Canada is chairing the IHRA this year.

Keynote speaker Jason Kenney, the federal minister for multiculturalism, said he hopes Canada's investment in Holocaust education and research will blot out the stain of the country's "ignoble history" of not accepting Jewish refugees who fled Europe before and during the war.

"It was not until our projects to join IHRA that we began to come to terms... with that history of wartime and immigration restriction measures on the victims of European anti-Semitism," Kenney said.

"These and other projects have helped us to face our own history honestly and have provided a platform through which [the government] could express our regret for the government of Canada's policy of exclusion in the 1930s and '40s."

At the dinner, Kenney also named the winner and runner-up of an international poster competition with the theme "Keeping the Memory Alive - Journeys through the Holocaust." The winner, Caitlin McGinn, and runner-up Carling Hind are both Canadian students at Emily Carr University of Art and Design in Vancouver.

McGinn and Hind worked on their posters in one six-hour block during exam time.

"A lot of people found it very challenging, due to the nature of such a complex issue," Hind said. "For whatever reason, we were able to find a personal connection to it, and trust that."

Posters from the winner, runner-up and Canadian finalists can be found on the Citizenship and Immigration Canada website.

Toronto teen used bat mitzvah to help raise funds for group

"It costs $1,000 to raise a puppy during the first year, and many students have found creative ways to not only raise funds, but more importantly to help raise awareness of the growing needs of the visually impaired."

Natalie Urbach, a 15-year-old student at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, spoke at the event about her efforts at the time of her bat mitzvah to bring attention to the cause and raise funds for the organization. When she and her family travelled to Israel this past summer, they visited the IGDCB and she was thrilled that she chose to support the centre.

The IGDCB's next event, Evening of Miracles, will be held at the Toronto Centre for the Arts on May 22, featuring international guitarist, singer and composer Jose Feliciano.

Italian cyclist named Righteous Among the Nations

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Champion cyclist Gino Bartali, who used his sporting reputation to help Italian Jews evade the Holocaust, has been named Righteous Among the Nations by Yad Vashem.

The Israel-based organization posthumously recognized Bartali, a two-time winner of the Tour de France, for acting as a courier in a wartime resistance network, delivering forged documents hidden in the stem of his bicycle, while in the guise of training.

"Knowingly risking his life to rescue Jews, Bartali transferred falsified documents to various contacts," Yad Vashem stated in announcing the honour.

Bartali's story was told in Road to Valour, a bestseller released last year by the Canadian brother-and-sister team of Aili and Andres McConnon.

Earlier this summer, Road to Valour won the Canadian Jewish Book Award. It had previously won the Mazzei Award from the National Italian American Foundation and a Christopher Award.

The Yad Vashem honour "highlights the most important legacy of this two-time Tour de France-winning cyclist," Andres said.

"We are thrilled that this award will bring the news of Bartali's heroism to people around the world. It's wonderful to think that so many new people will learn about an Italian cyclist and humanitarian and discover the story that captivated us over so many years," he added.

Gino Bartali in a photo taken around 1936

According to Yad Vashem, Bartali became a "widely admired national hero" in prewar Italy after winning the Tour de France in 1938 and the Giro d'Italia, the Italian equivalent, twice.

A devout Roman Catholic, Bartali joined a church-based resistance organization following the Nazi occupation of Italy in 1943. The resistance was led by Archbishop Elia Angelo Dalla Costa, himself recognized in 2012 as Righteous Among the Nations, along with Rabbi Nathan Cassuto.

Hundreds of Jews were saved by the network.

Bartali delivered documents hidden in his bicycle over a wide area. "When Bartali was stopped and searched, he specifically asked that his bicycle not be touched since the different parts were very carefully calibrated to achieve maximum speed," Yad Vashem stated.

While researching their book, the McConnons shared their findings with Yad Vashem, which was already examining Bartali's wartime efforts.

"We were happy to help and in the process inquired whether they had recognized Cardinal Dalla Costa, one of the leaders of the Tuscan counterfeiting network. Yad Vashem then also continued to do its own rigorous research according to its own specifications," Andres said.

"With Bartali's recognition…all of the key members of this heroic Tuscan and Umbrian counterfeiting network have been honoured," the McConnons stated.

The McConnons have lectured widely about Bartali since their book came out.

"The fascinating thing is that Jewish and gentile audiences seem drawn to the same elements of Bartali's story – overcoming an impoverished childhood, the excitement of professional racing and the hardship and courage of the war years," they stated.

Grandparents go back to school at CHAT

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

The Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Kimel Family Education Centre in Vaughan celebrated students of another era at its inaugural Grandparents" Day last week.

"There will be no tests, no assignments being graded, and we have asked teachers to refrain from giving out detentions to any of our grandparents – so you are safe today," TanenbaumCHAT president Les Fluxgold joked with the 190 visiting "students" Oct. 9.

The seniors were welcomed by the campus choir, which sang an arrangement of melodies as the visitors made their way through a morning assembly and breakfast.

"Grandparents are our [students'] biggest fans. They are our walking resumes, telling anyone who will listen how accomplished, beautiful, smart, considerate, capable and unique we really are," she said, adding that "you are the ones who worry whether we have a Jewish education worthy of the sacrifices you and the generations before you have made."

The seniors watched a video that showcased the wide range of subjects offered and learned of the more than 70 clubs and committees at the school. They were then escorted to their grandchildrens' classes for an interactive hour of learning.

The grandparents later stopped by a photo booth with their grandchildren en route to their final destination of the day, a luncheon at the Schwartz/Reisman Centre.

TanenbaumCHAT's Wallenberg campus on Wilmington Avenue will be celebrating its second annual Grandparents' Day on Oct. 23, when many of the grandparents will head back to school to do it all over again with another grandchild.

Demand for winter Birthright trips down

It's not coming naturally, though: you would expect with a free Birthright trip, you wouldn't have to work hard for it," the British immigrant says.

Shitrit chalks up the poor registration to a glut of trip possibilities, while others cite poor marketing.

"The providers have no history of effective marketing and are now surprised that there are 1.5 people per seat instead of 10," says David Abitbol, founder of the blog Jewlicious, who has had interactions with Birthright since the latter's inception in 1999.

"I know for a fact that there's more money and more spots available than ever before. But for a long time, the combination of not as many spots and lots of interest made providers lazy in terms of marketing," Abitbol says.

And whereas few spots, uncertainty about the program's continuance and word-of-mouth were once enough to make up for marketing, nowadays potential participants are also more lackadaisical about registration, taking for granted that the trip would be waiting for them until they are 27 years old.

Demand in Canada for winter Birthright trips is also low, at least compared to the summer tours, but this year's numbers are consistent with previous years, says Michael Soberman, national director for Canada Israel Experience, which organizes Birthright trips for Canadians.

That's because Canadian students only get two weeks off in the winter – compared with four weeks for students in the United States, and up to four months in the summer – which leaves no time for them to extend their Israel sojourns after the winter Birthright trips end, he explains.

An early October email from Birthright's New York office obtained by The Times of Israel indicates the organization is aware of the problem: "Just a quick note to make sure that you all know that in light of this season's lower registration numbers, we are strongly considering keeping registration open indefinitely. For that reason, from now forward please do not communicate to prospective applicants in any way that registration will be closing."

In response to The CJN's request for comment on reports of low demand, Taglit-Birthright in New York said it extended registration because of the early holiday season, which makes it difficult for some to apply, as well as a "broader selection of winter dates that may slow the process down while matching applicants to a particular trip."

Taglit-Birthright Israel CEO Gidi Mark says that closing registration is a fine art.

"Registration is a delicate balance," says Mark, a former career diplomat in Israel's Foreign Ministry. "The goal: create a manageable number of reserves to find an optimal number to fill the planes, create homogeneous groups, and not over-register."

Mark's assistant in Birthright's Israel office, Jonnie Schnytzer, clarifies that the leaked email came from a very junior worker who only started working for the organization a month ago and should not have been sent.

He admits there are currently a few thousand fewer potential participants in preregistration than last year, saying, "We're probably a week behind last year but planning to close it within the week."

As of Oct. 7, some 24,000 people had applied from North America, with another 5,500 applicants from the rest of the world, Schnytzer said.

"We're planning to bring 17,000 this year, up 1,500 from last year, so somewhere in between there is the waiting list," says Schnytzer.

But Shlomo Lifshitz, until 2009 by far the largest Birthright provider with his Oranim company, says that in meetings earlier this month with several Birthright organizers, he was told there is no waiting list at all, since the summer trips took care of them.

To date, some 350,000 young adults from around the world have participated in Birthright.

Canada called a more traditional community

The projection for the intermarriage rate in Montreal for 2011 is only 16 per cent because of the Sephardi element, Shahar said.

"It's more conservative in religion. So is Toronto… I suspect that the projections I gave you are even a little high, and that our intermarriage rate is going to be well below the American rate for a long time," Shahar said.

Schnoor suggested that Canada's lower rate could be attributed to a more traditional community.

"A good marker of that is day school enrolment. Day school enrolments in Toronto are 33 per cent approximately, and in Montreal, 60 per cent approximately. In the United States, it's about 17 per cent overall. That's a big difference, and that's a reflection of the fact that Canada is a more traditional, Jewish place."

Another reason could be "the immigration patterns of such a large proportion of Reform Jews from Germany to the United States. We didn't have that immigration, [and] that really formed the bedrock of the American Jewish community, a much more liberal foundation, which we don't have here," he added.

Although Canada's intermarriage rates are much lower than in the United States, "you can't deny that the intermarriage rates have gone up and up," Schnoor said.

McGill University sociologist Morton Weinfeld said the reason for the climbing rates in North America might have to do with "a postmodern belief by many Jews that they can have their cake and eat it, too. They can remain Jewish in some way that may be meaningful to them while marrying outside the faith and being fully immersed in the non-Jewish world."

Schnoor took an optimistic approach to the reason behind the rising numbers, suggesting that "Jews are able to intermarry because they are so accepted. In fact, they're desired partners… Sixty or 70 years ago, that was not the case, because North American Jews were suffering so much anti-Semitism. The problem has shifted so that, instead of wanting to beat us up, now they want to marry us."

According to the Pew study, 32 per cent of U.S. Jews born after 1980 – the millennial generation – identify as Jews of no religion, are disconnected from the organized Jewish community and are much less likely to raise their children Jewish.

That's compared to the baby boomer generation, born between 1946 and 1964, of which only 19 per cent identified as Jews of no religion.

But Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, spiritual leader of Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto, said the study didn't "differentiate between people who really have no religion and people who say no religion, but wind up having a bar mitzvah, or come to a Shabbat dinner, or they might mark other religious occasions and holidays."

Chabad of Markham spiritual leader Rabbi Avraham Plotkin also challenged the Pew findings on the millennial generation, because they were polled "at a point in life when Jewishness means the least [to them].

"I think if you would have asked the hippies in the… '60s, they would have told you the same thing. And if you look at the same [people today], they are now the conservative people who are paying for the big buildings in the Jewish community," Rabbi Plotkin said.

"When you ask people of that age, you're not asking the 60-year-olds what they felt when they were 20."

Another statistic that seemed to elicit more questions than answers was that 94 per cent of U.S. Jews said they were proud to be Jewish.

"There is a tremendous amount of pride in Jewish identity and we are challenged to ask, how do we build on that?" Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said.

"How do you take something that's positive, but relatively weak, and find ways to enhance it, deepen it and strengthen it?"

Weinfeld agreed that "it's terrific if people say they are proud to be Jewish, but the next question is, what does that mean in terms of specific actions?"

"There is a growing population of Jews who are hard to fit within the traditional categories, so you can be just Jewish or partially Jewish. The big challenge going forward is what to do with these partially Jewish Jews."

Rabbi Debra Landsberg, spiritual leader of Toronto's Temple Emanu-El, said that labelling Jews is "always tricky.

"[For the] Jews saying they are still proud of being Jewish… I have no doubt that there are many in that category for whom Jewishness is something vast and mysterious and ethically demanding and can't be summed up as religion," she said.

Rabbi Lansberg said the way Jews are often forced to fit into "categories of identity" does not speak to a younger generation.

"I think it behooves us to switch it and say, 'We're not going to start talking about status, let's start talking about dreams, hopes, vision, commitment and connectedness.' How do we grow and develop that? Status questions [should be] secondary," she said.

Rabbi Plotkin said Jewish community leaders need "to tap into the 94 per cent who are proud and to cultivate that pride and to teach them that it's not enough just to be proud but to translate it into living Jewish."

U of Toronto hosts Holocaust conference

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Seventy years after the end of the Holocaust, researchers are still coming up with new areas to research and study.

A conference titled "The Holocaust: New Scholars – New Research" brought more than 150 people, most of them scholars, from around the world to the University of Toronto for two days of learning on Oct. 6 and 7.

"It's a chance for [scholars] to interact and learn from each other," said Doris Bergen, chancellor Rose and Ray Wolfe professor of Holocaust studies at the University of Toronto.

"We're trying to showcase the vibrant research that's been done on the Holocaust all over the world."

In addition to scholars, attendees at the semiannual meeting included members of the general public and members of the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance (IHRA), an intergovernmental organization that encourages political and social leaders to support Holocaust education, remembrance and research.

The panel discussions often raised more questions than they answered.

For example, the first panel focused on journalistic reporting of the Holocaust, or the lack thereof.

Norman Domeier, an assistant professor of modern European history at the University of Stuttgart, spoke about "What Did the Global Public Know? Foreign Correspondents in the Third Reich, 1933-1945." He said the fact the atrocities didn't dominate the front pages of world newspapers can only be attributed to "insensitive, unprofessional journalism."

Some of the presenters showcased modern ways of looking at the Holocaust, including Stephanie Benzaquen, whose talk was called "Hashtag Holocaust: Social Networks, Production of Images, and the Cultural Memory of the Holocaust."

Benzaquen, a PhD candidate in art history and a researcher at the Centre for Historical Culture at the School of History, Culture and Communication at Erasmus University in the Netherlands, focused her discussion on Instagram, the photo-sharing site that lets users add filters to make pictures appear like heritage photos.

Benzaquen said her research involves collecting Instagram photos that relate to the Holocaust, such as the Auschwitz death camp museum, and categorizing the filters used on the pictures, examining whether they're black and white, sepia, soft-toned or vibrant.

Such information can't shed more light on the Holocaust, but it may help understand how the public relates to the Shoah, she said.

Alexander McPherson, a graduate student at Trent University, said Benzaquen's presentation was particularly interesting, because it suggested new ways of looking at memorialization.

"Already I'm thinking of things in ways I haven't thought of before," he said.

The IHRA provides funding for scholarship on the Holocaust, and Bergen said she hoped a delegate might learn about a research topic and decide to help fund a project, especially from countries such as Italy, where research on the Holocaust is not very well funded.

Peter Staudenmaier, an assistant professor of history at Marquette University, a Jesuit school in Milwaukee, said he doesn't normally study the Holocaust, but he happened to be researching a small anti-Semitic institute in fascist Italy when he heard about the conference.

He didn't know what to expect when he agreed to be part of a panel, but he said he saw the gathering as an opportunity for historians to share what they know and to look at old information in new ways.

Triplets inspire gala for kids with neurological disorders

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

More than $500,000 was raised at the fourth annual Stems of Hope Gala in support of a charity dedicated to investing in innovative research, education, therapies and programs for childhood neurological disorders.

Three To Be was founded in 2010 by Jared and Dana Florence, parents of triplets who are now 5-1/2 years old and were each diagnosed with cerebral palsy, a neurological condition that has no cure.

"Our theme this year was 'Just Be Love' which is such a fitting theme for what is happening in this room tonight," Dana told the 1,000 people at the Oct. 4 event, which was hosted by Global TV's Leslie Roberts and Liza Fromer.

"We do this for the love of our children, Taylor, Cole and Brody, and to show them that life is to be celebrated and that real hope exists despite adversity," Dana added.

"Along the way, we realized there was a need to help the parents of these special children. We are incredibly proud of [Three To Be's] Parent Advocacy Link [program], which is allowing us to provide guidance and support to the most important advocates for children – their parents."

Money raised by this year's gala will fund research in two key areas: stem-cell treatments that promote brain repair, and innovative technology to make communication possible for children who can't speak.

The Stems of Hope Galas have raised more than $2 million in total in the past four years.

"A portion of tonight's funds will go toward helping kids who have no means of communication," said Yvonne Stefanin, vice-president of the Holland Bloorview Foundation.

The Florence family, from left, Brody, Dana, Taylor, Jared and Cole [Susan Minuk photo]

"Our researchers, led by Dr. Tom Chau, have developed these amazing ways of defining any sort of sensory motion that a person might have. Some may just be able to move their eyebrow, others move a tongue, or even just wink slightly. Dr. Chau picks up on that motion and he is then able to train the person to be able to define letters on a computer, so that with a blink of an eye, or a move of an eyebrow, they are able to take a letter and for the first time ever they are able to communicate like never before."

Dana Florence told The CJN about her children's gains over the past year.

"Taylor loves princesses and the colour pink. She loves to go shopping and she loves school and her friends. Although my son, Brody, can't communicate verbally, he's been working on his communication, and he's really come very far. Through his communication book, he's able to tell us exactly what he wants and needs, and for him, that is just remarkable. Then there is Cole, who has come leaps and bounds with his talking."

Deaf until age three, "Cole wears cochlear implants and is now reading and able to type on a computer. He can even write letters."

"Three To Be is what gives us strength. The overwhelming support from the community inspires us to continue on. Nothing is impossible. The word itself says that 'I am possible,'" Dana said.

Groups seek to educate Jews about organ donations

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

The National Council of Jewish Women Canada, Toronto section, along with a number of downtown congregations and groups, have joined together to present a program on the Jewish perspective on organ donation.

Titled "Yes You Can," the event takes place Oct. 21 at 7:30 p.m. at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the University of Toronto.

The evening includes a presentation by Rabbi Aaron Levy, leader of Makom: Creative Downtown Judaism, and Rabbi Miriam Margles, spiritual leader of Danforth Jewish Circle, who will discuss Jewish law as it relates to organ and tissue donation.

Dr. Jeff Zaltzman, chief medical officer of Trillium, a not-for-profit agency of the government of Ontario that plans, promotes, co-ordinates and supports organ and tissue transplants and donations across Ontario, will be available for questions.

Also on the program will be presentations by donors and recipients, as well as a screening of My Second Bar Mitzvah, about Frank Bialystok's liver transplant.

Rabbi Levy said he's participating in the evening because it is "an important topic that speaks to saving people's lives.

"[Donors] have a tremendous opportunity of saving lives through organ and tissue donation."

There's a myth, he said, that Jews can't donate their organs. "We want to clarify what Jewish tradition says. In general, we do not desecrate a dead body, but [organ donation] is an intervention that saves lives. It is for a positive purpose."

Ronda Pinsky, chair of NCJW's Gift of Life program, said that in the one year her organization's website has enabled people to sign up to become donors, 219 people have done so.

"We weren't sure, at first, how people would respond to having this link on our website, but it has been positive."

She said it's been four years since NCJW has partnered with Trillium.

"We felt that as a Jewish organization, we had to spread the word that 'yes you can' [donate organs]. Many Jews do not understand that donating an organ is the greatest mitzvah a Jew can perform," Pinsky said.

"We want to educate the community about organ and tissue transplants. About 75 people can be saved from one person's tissues, and about eight lives can be saved from one person's organs. Donor age does not matter."

IDF soldiers attend therapeutic retreat

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The soldiers were greeted at Toronto's Pearson International Airport last week.

A group of Israeli combat soldiers from Rescue Air Force 669, a medical evacuation and extraction unit that served together in the 2006 Lebanon War, arrived in Toronto last week for a therapeutic retreat co-ordinated by Peace of Mind (POM).

This is the seventh group since 2010 to be brought to Toronto by POM, a program funded by the Israel Center for the Treatment of Psychotrauma (ICTP) that helps discharged Israeli soldiers cope with trauma they may have suffered during their service.

The ICTP treats the estimated nine per cent of Israelis who suffer from post-traumatic stress disorder, which is three times the level of that in most western countries.

This group of soldiers, who rescued injured and dead soldiers on the battlefield, were hosted by Thornhill's Sephardic Kehila Centre.

"Many people ask why we bring them from Israel, here. It helps the therapy. They are disconnected from all the triggers, the pressures of school, of work," said Linoy Hazan, POM's Canadian co-ordinating director, explaining that two therapists from Israel accompanied the soldiers to Toronto.

Aviram Lazar, 31, who served as commander of the group, told The CJN at a fundraising bowling event on Oct. 9 that the program has helped him cope with issues he didn't even know he had.

"This week is the first time that someone really asked us... how do you think it influenced the rest of your life, the way you work, they way you are in relationships, and the way you look at yourself?" Lazar said.

"Most of us had no idea that we were really struggling with things from seven, eight or 10 years ago."

As a soldier in a rescue unit, he said he had to cope with constant tension and uncertainty about what the next day, or even hour, would bring.

"You could be in your room sleeping, or you could be in the office working on something and the next minute there is a siren and you're running to the helicopter and 15 minutes later, you find yourself in Gaza helping a group of soldiers rescue an injured soldier," Lazar said.

Lazar said he was surprised by how much he and his group benefited from the program and was touched by the warmth and generosity of Toronto's Jewish community, which has raised some $400,000 for the initiative since 2010.

"It's very heartwarming... In fact, it is one of the things that unite us. In the army, we weren't used to receiving help. We were used to giving help... Now these strangers are giving us help and we don't know why... We don't feel like we deserve it."

The program continues when the soldiers return home to Israel. They are assessed by their therapists and advised about whether they should continue with private therapy.

POM will be bringing in another group of Israeli soldiers, who will be hosted by Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, to Toronto on Nov. 10.

Dr. Ian Wexler

Remembering Dr. Ian Wexler ל' ז

In September, 2013, the Israel Tennis Centers Foundation announced the naming of a tennis court in memory of York Racquets member Dr. Ian Wexler, who passed away earlier this year. The Dr. Ian Wexler Memorial Court will be located at the Israel Tennis Center in Ramat Hasharon (just outside of Tel Aviv), Israel, home of Canada Stadium and host of Israel's Davis Cup matches.

Charitable donations to the Dr. Ian Wexler Memorial Court Fund may be made by contacting Gloria Truong at the Israel Tennis Centers Toronto office, at 416-444-5700, ext. 2714 or gtruong@israeltenniscenters.org.

The Israel Tennis Centers Foundation

Shaping lifelong champions since 1976

For 37 years the Israel Tennis Centers have been promoting the social, psychological and physical development of Israeli youth through the medium of sport.

Using the game of tennis as a framework, just over 20,000 children participated last year in Israel Tennis Centers programs from Kiryat Shmona in the north to Beer Sheva in the south. Many of the 14 Israel Tennis Centers are located in economically challenged neighborhoods and outlying development towns.

Programs for Developmentally and Physically Challenged, Arab/Jewish Coexistence Doubles, Coexistence Kindergartens, and Ethiopian community programming are among the many ITC programs - all focused on tolerance, belief in one's self and the virtues of teamwork.

That the Israel Tennis Centers turn out world class Israeli tennis champions is a fortunate and exciting by-product. Every kid can be a champion in life.

A Jewish way with words – Pt. 1

Jewish & Digital
Mark Mietklewicz

"My father never lived to see his dream come true of an all-Yiddish-speaking Canada." – David Steinberg [http://bit.ly/jquote1]

At least Mr. Steinberg gave us David – and many other Jewish parents gave us sons and daughters who have been able to help us crack a smile or make a serious point with only a handful of well-chosen words. Today, we look at Jewish sayings to ponder, amuse and share. (Bookmark these sites for the next time you have to deliver a speech and need just the right line.)

Let's start at the beginning – or should that be "In the Beginning?" The Torah, Mishnah, Talmud and their commentaries are full of words to the wise, and are as relevant as ever. The Jewish Education Network has brought together hundreds of them. A sampling:

• "Be pliable like a reed, not rigid like a cedar." – Eliezer Ben Simon: Taanit 20b

• "Drink plenty of water with your meals." – Berakot 40a

• "A Jew who sinned is still a Jew." – Abba ben Zabdai, Sanhedrin 44a

• "Love your wife as yourself - and honour her more." – Yebamoth 62b

• "Do not take drugs, because they will become habitual, your heart will request them and you will also waste money. Even as medicine, don't use drugs if another medicine is possible." – 12th century commentator Rabbi Samuel ben Meir [http://bit.ly/jquote2]

Jewish Quotations has culled more than 3,000 sayings from quite an interesting crowd. Where else could you read about the musings of the Chofetz Chaim ("It is no challenge to die like a Jew. The true challenge is to live like a Jew.") next to those of Woody Allen ("The good people sleep much better at night than the bad people. Of course, the bad people enjoy the waking hours much more.") You can search by topic (animals, anti-Semitism, books, etc.) or by keyword. More Jewish gems:

• "Days are scrolls, you may write on them what you wish." – Bahya ben Asher

• "A kind word is no substitute for a piece of herring or a bag of oats." – Sholom Aleichem

• "Nobody has ever drowned in his own sweat." – Anne Landers [http://bit.ly/jquote3]

"If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning ... if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy." (Psalms 137:5) Jews have always striven for the right words to describe Jerusalem. Here are two of the best pages devoted to the holy city, one with traditional quotes:

• "Ten measures of beauty descended to the world; nine were taken by Jerusalem." - Kiddushin 49b [http://bit.ly/jquote4]

And another page has contemporary quotes:

• "Through a historical catastrophe – the destruction of Jerusalem by the emperor of Rome – I was born in one of the cities in the Diaspora. But I always deemed myself a child of Jerusalem, one who is in reality a native of Jerusalem." – S.Y. Agnon, upon receiving the Nobel Prize for Literature, 1966 [http://bit.ly/jquote5]

I started this column with David Steinberg's Canadian dream. Let's conclude with a Jewish quote from south of the border. "The time is at hand when the wearing of a prayer shawl and skullcap will not bar a man from the White House, unless, of course, the man is Jewish." – Jules Farber [http://bit.ly/jquote6]

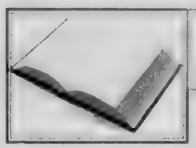
The raven and the dove

Rabbi David Cadoch



Rabbinic Reflections

We read in Parshat Noach of the destruction of life via a deluge caused by the corruption of humanity. At the end of 40 days of continuous rain, Noah sends out a raven to scout the land to determine if the floods have receded. The verse reads: "And he sent forth a raven, and it went forth to and fro, until the waters were dried up from off the earth." The raven flies off and returns each time to signal that there is no dry land.

Then Noah sends out a dove, and the wording changes. "And he sent forth a dove from him, to see if the waters were abated... But the dove found no rest for the sole of her foot, and she returned unto him to the ark...; and he put forth his hand... and brought her in unto him into the ark."

The wording "sent from him" seems superfluous, but when we examine the rabbinic writings, light is shed on the relationship between the dove and humans. The dove symbolizes love and peace. It is now the symbol of the United Nations. This is one of the few species of birds who remain with their mate for life, a monogamous concept that's the foundation of marriage in our society when a couple build their home by Torah standards.

Furthermore, when the dove returns to signal the land's state, Noah reaches out his hand and brings the dove into the ark. This care and concern are what love and peace represent, and these holy concepts need to be present in promoting the ideals of peace and harmony.

Last year, my children and I witnessed first hand the manner in which a dove and its mate build their home. We have a tree next to our window. Prior to building its home, the female dove scouted the area with her mate from a telephone wire. They observed our family every day, and watched for intruders. At some point, they must have decided it was safe. Every day, the doves brought twigs and leaves to build their home. We watched the construction, and although it seemed fragile, we were surprised at its resilience during rain and wind.

Finally, the mother established herself in the nest and the father flew off to bring food. During the day, he watched from the telephone wire, and once evening arrived, he sat next to his mate and kept her warm and safe. This happened even after the chicks were born, until they were ready to leave the nest. Every year since, they have returned to the same nest. My children were awed at this demonstration of care and devotion.

Now we can understand why Noah chose the dove as his messenger. In his final flight to discover dry land, the raven disappeared, whereas the dove returned with a dry olive branch. Olive oil was later used to light the menorah, a guiding light for the people of Israel. It was also used install the Kohen Gadol into his holy mandate, and to anoint the kings of Israel.

The United Nations should re-examine the symbol behind them and be reminded of what the dove and the olive branch represent.

Rabbi David Cadoch is the spiritual leader for Shabbat and chagim at Beth Hakenneset HaRambam at the Donald Berman Maimonides Geriatric Hospital.

Why Israel's municipal elections matter

Yonatan Weinberg Sybil Ottenstein

From the Reut Institute

In a few short days, the State of Israel will be holding one of the country's most significant elections in recent years. Israelis are beginning to comprehend the fact that municipal elections, and not only highly publicized national elections, have a palpable impact on their quality of life.

Municipalities have a decidedly intertwined relationship with communal institutions such as schools, community centres, kindergartens, etc. These institutions have an enormous impact on our daily lives, affecting personal security, culture, education and various other aspects of "quality of life."

Developing communal institutions can bridge the gap between citizens and local government. As can be seen throughout Jewish history, communities are the critical building blocks of a resilient society and the platform best positioned to enhance the capacity of individuals and to address collective needs and goals.

Jewish Canadians, for instance, have effectively incorporated communal institutions into their daily lives, forming a web of institutions and organizations that enhance the quality of life for those within the community. Acting as mediators between the demands of citizens and the institutions of municipalities, communities are the most desirable level at which to facilitate dialogue between government and the public.

However, while the range and scale of their influence is vast, municipal elections still don't receive nearly enough attention within the Israeli public sphere. The underlying issue extends beyond elections. For the most part, municipalities have simply not been able to effectively connect with the public and demonstrate their relevance to people's everyday lives.

Today, Israel's communal institutions need a fundamental change in approach. The ability to catalyze this change depends on the persistence and dedication of a community's residents. Once citizens understand that they're stakeholders in their communities, they can begin to transform their communal institutions into vibrant and dynamic centres of communal life. As a result, community members can take a personal role in enhancing the resilience of their communities..

The role of community platforms in socio-economic development is central to the Reut Institute's work on what we call the "Urban Leapfrog" project. For the last 2-1/2 years, the institute has been working with the municipality of Safed, a city in northern Israel that faces significant socio-economic challenges, in order to create a vast and sustained improvement in residents' quality of life.

Our shared vision sees communal institutions as the epicentre of change. For example, one of Reut's projects in Safed unites the city's young adult centre with the women's organization Wepower Israel in order to create an intensive women's leadership course for community members. The course's participants have shown personal initiative, completing projects designed to respond to specific civic challenges in their community.

Creating a productive dialogue between citizens, communal institutions and municipalities enhances residents' human capital, providing them with a sense of ownership of the public sphere. This process will succeed if Israeli society adopts the same communal structures that are vibrant and thriving in the Jewish Diaspora.

The authors are analysts at the Reut Institute in Tel Aviv.

Breaking the silence

From the Bimah

Rabbi Joe Kanofsky

"We don't speak to each other." "We aren't on speaking terms." "She and I haven't spoken in nine years."

Long before I began working as a community rabbi, I was aware of the "we're not talking" malady, because friends and extended family suffered from it. The more I paid attention, the more commonplace I found this problem to be.

The irony is bitter that in our hyper-connected age, people in families still deliberately avoid contact with one another. Or perhaps it's not so surprising. Telephones, Skype, FaceTime, email, text and Twitter all serve to connect us when we want to connect, but they're no more than tools. So when we want to avoid using them to avoid contact with another person, they serve that function just as well.

Any number of causes underlie this phenomenon. It's sometimes triggered by a simple misunderstanding – a careless word, a comment taken the wrong way or a perceived slight. The Thanksgiving scene in the film Avalon comes to mind: "You cut the turkey? Without me?" But the roots lie deeper than that. Self-confidence issues are often at the forefront of these fragile relationships before the rupture happens. Other sources of animosity can also be the cause: finances, death or illness of someone close, envy, or love. One person may blame another for something that had little to do with them: "You caused Grandpa's heart attack!" "She was never the same after you moved away!" – and so on.

Other times, the lack of communication may be rooted in profound differences or issues – abusive or toxic relationships and radical lifestyle changes, for example.

Whatever the genesis of these estrangements, it's often difficult to recognize that life is short and fences can be mended. Sometimes, an extreme situation will tip the scales and bring about a reconciliation: a joyous event such as a wedding or birth, or on the other end of the spectrum, a death.

As layers of resentment and bitterness accrue over months, years or decades, "forgive and forget" seems like an inadequate strategy for repairing a damaged relationship. Yet sometimes it may not be necessary to work through all the problems and history of a troubled relationship. As an American politician from mid-century once said, "When all is said and done, we must forgive each other, redeem each other, and move on."

Someone must seize the high ground and take the first step to try to re-establish the connection. Once an inroad has been made, it might be that the most difficult thing to do is not to talk, but rather to listen. It may take some rehashing of old grudges, some revisits of slights from many years before, in order to heal the wounds. But it can happen, and I myself have been witness to a silence of 40 years broken and a relationship restored and renewed.

If you have a unique story of how a relationship of yours or of someone you know was restored after a period of silence and you'd like to share it, I'd like to listen. Please write me at joekanofsky@gmail.com.

Iran cancels anti-Zionism conference

The Times of Israel

Iranian officials have reportedly ordered the cancellation of an annual anti-Zionism conference.

As part of an apparent effort to rebrand the Islamic Republic in post-Ahmadinejad times, the New Horizon Conference, scheduled to take place in November, was cancelled by the Foreign Ministry, reported the British daily The Telegraph.

Hassan Rouhani [Wikimedia Commons]

Hardliners in Iran blasted the decision, which they see as another concession on the part of the new government. Iran's recently elected president, Hassan Rouhani, has made a concerted effort to put a new face on the regime in Tehran. This after eight years of his Holocaust-denying predecessor, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Websites sympathetic to organizers of the conference displayed strings of angry comments, according to the British report: "Have our leaders given in so much to the world that are even afraid of a conference that might hurt Mr. [Barack]] Obama's feelings?" read one post. "The latest piece from our government's show of capitulation," read another.

In the United States and in Israel last week, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has been speaking repeatedly to U.S., European and even Farsi-language media outlets, warning of Iran's and Rouhani's duplicity regarding the nuclear issue, and urging the international community not to lift sanctions unless or until Iran is stripped of its "military nuclear" capabilities.

If sanctions on Iran are removed without ensuring a guaranteed end to uranium enrichment, Europe and the rest of the world will face hundreds of nuclear weapons in the hands of a "murderous" regime, Netanyahu said in a series of interviews with European media outlets last Thursday.

"When a murderous regime engages in soft diplomacy and uses calming words of peace, but nevertheless continues to acquire immense power — it must be stopped, immediately," Netanyahu said, according to quotes provided by the Prime Minister's Office.

"This is the central lesson of the 20th century. It's also the central lesson of North Korea. If [the Iranian regime] is not stopped immediately, there won't be just two bombs pointed toward you [the Europeans], but 200. Stop it now while you're in a strong position to do so," he exhorted.

The interviews were conducted with Germany's Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung and ARD TV, France's Le Monde and France 24, and the UK's Financial Times and Sky TV.

Israeli Air Force sends warning to Iran

Israeli Air Force F-15 [Flash90 photo]

JTA

JERUSALEM — The Israeli Air Force held a long-range missions exercise and posted photos and a video of the drill in a move widely interpreted as a warning aimed at Iran.

The footage posted last Thursday on YouTube shows the aerial refueling of two warplanes, an F-15 and an F-16, from several angles, including from within the cockpit. The photos, which were posted along with the video on the Hebrew-language version of the Israel Air Force website, show three fighter jets accompanying a fueling plane at an unspecified location.

"'All options on the table' means also military options," the item on the website read, in what foreign and local media interpreted as a clear allusion to Israel's options in its efforts to prevent Iran from developing military nuclear capabilities. "The air force, the long arm of the Israel Defence Force, is tasked with carrying out that option if necessary."

Iran has denied that it is pursuing plans to develop military nuclear weapons.

According to Haaretz, Greece's air force also participated in the drill.

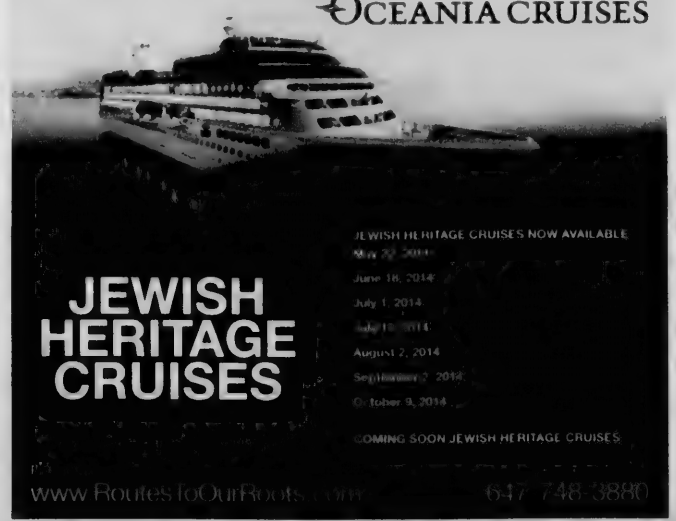
OCEANIA CRUISES



Circumcision ban dropped

JNS.org

The Council of Europe won't ban male ritual circumcision as it does female genital mutilation, the organization's Secretary-General Thorbjorn Jagland wrote in a letter to Israeli President Shimon Peres.

The letter came in response to Peres's appeal over the council's resolution against circumcision earlier this month. The council's Parliamentary Assembly called male ritual circumcision a "violation of the physical integrity of children," and voted in favor of the non-binding resolution, 78-13. Peres wrote to Jagland that male circumcision is a "fundamental element of our tradition and obligation as Jews."

Jagland wrote that female circumcision is considered gender-based violence.

"While our organization is of course fully committed to children's rights to physical integrity, nothing in the body of our legally binding standards would lead us to put on equal footing the issue of female genital mutilation and the circumcision of young boys for religious reasons," he wrote.

Correction

The article "Shas founder Rabbi Ovadia Yosef dies at 93" (Oct. 10) contained conflicting details about Rabbi Yosef's birthplace. He was born in Iraq and moved to Egypt as a very young boy. The CJN regrets the error.

Nobels could have been Israel's: HU president

David Shamah
The Times of Israel

Israelis shouldn't be surprised that their best and brightest are going abroad to win Nobel Prizes, says Menachem Ben-Sasson.

As president of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Ben-Sasson has felt the pain of brain drain acutely: "For decades, the country has neglected to upgrade and expand research facilities and budgets that scientists need to get their work done. Our universities would love it if their graduates came back home to continue their work, but that requires investment," he told the Times of Israel.

Menachem Ben-Sasson (Wikimedia Commons)

On Wednesday, the Nobel Prize for chemistry was awarded to two U.S.-based professors who met at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot and are former Israelis: Arieh Warshel, born on a kibbutz and a professor of chemistry and biochemistry at the University of Southern California in Los Angeles since the 1970s, and Michael Levitt, who was born in South Africa, immigrated to Israel in 1979 and taught at Weizmann between 1980 and 1987. They share the Nobel with Prof. Martin Kaplus, a Jew who fled Austria for the United States with his family in 1938, and whose daughter, Rebecca, is a family doctor in Jerusalem.

In what pundits called a prime example of the problem of brain drain – the large-scale emigration of scientists and other academics because they cannot find suitable positions in Israel – Warshel told Israeli interviewers that he had left the Weizmann Institute "because they wouldn't give me tenure." Levitt also felt professionally stymied.

In the 1980s, Warshel said, the issue of job security in inflation-ridden Israel was a very serious one, and he felt there was no choice but to seek a stable academic future abroad. (In response to Warshel's comments, the Weizmann Institute said in a statement that he would most certainly have advanced, had he remained).

Maybe he was right, Ben-Sasson said last week. "You can't generalize from an individual case, but the way things are, Israeli researchers feel they have no choice."

The way to get Nobel-quality researchers to do their work in Israel is to provide them with the resources they need, he said.

By "resources," Ben-Sasson does not necessarily mean higher salaries. "Many of our PhDs and scientists want to work in Israel and they don't care about the salary," he said. "What they do care about is having the tools and equipment they need to work, modern labs and a cluster of other scientists they can work with."

On Monday, the Taub Center for Social Policy Studies released a report decrying shortcomings in Israel's higher education system that have led to the brain drain problem.

The report determined that "Israel's academic brain drain to the United States is unparalleled, with 29 Israeli scholars in the U.S. for every 100 remaining at home" in 2008 (the most recent year for which information is available). The figures were well beyond those of "brain drain runner-up" Canada, which lost just 11.5 per cent of its researchers to the United States that same year.

Compared with statistics from five years earlier, the brain drain rate in most countries had fallen, but in Israel it rose.

What about all the highly touted recent investments in higher education?

"Absolutely there is money going to universities, but the question is what is being done with it? Much of it has gone to build classrooms, which of course you need," Ben-Sasson said. (There are currently 300,000 students in Israeli higher education programs, a per capita increase of 400 per cent since 1973.) "But what are they teaching? You need classrooms, but you need 10 times more investment for labs and equipment for scientists, and this is something the policymakers have forgotten about."

Government programs to recruit scientists who have gone abroad haven't changed things much. "Believe me, we know exactly which of our graduates and researchers went abroad and why," Ben-Sasson said. "This past year, Hebrew University announced 50 new academic positions, an unprecedented number. And for each position, we had as many as 25 applications," he said. "We could fill many more positions, but the resources are limited."

Could a country as small as Israel find positions for all these academics going abroad? Most definitely, Ben-Sasson claimed, even if they don't all become lecturers at Hebrew U. It's a matter of creativity, he said. "Scientists care about research, and they need the facilities to do that, but when it comes to employment you could have some variety – with some researchers working in industry or business. You could have, for example, a situation where a PhD is teaching in an advanced high school class. It's a matter of being wiser in how we use people."

Not all will want to stay. Many budding Israeli academics go abroad to do post-graduate studies, because of the paucity of doctoral programs here, and some will always find situations that fit them abroad. But the large majority want to come back to Israel, Ben-Sasson reasoned, adding that it's the state's responsibility to give them that option. "The only way to do that is invest in infrastructure, in equipment and in opportunities," he said. "Once we do that, they will come back.

"I'm happy that people of merit won the Nobel, and that they worked in Israel," he said. "Israeli education got recognition from people around the world for its quality. It says something about the power and positive side of academia in Israel."

Jews share in top honours

JTA and JNS.org

Two Israeli scientists and one American Jewish scientist will share the Nobel Prize in chemistry, while Jews were also among the winners of Nobels for physics and medicine.

Arieh Warshel, a U.S. professor born and educated in Israel, and ex-Weizmann Institute professor Michael Levitt were among the winners of the 2014 Nobel Prize for chemistry, the Royal Swedish Academy of Sciences announced last week..

Warshel, 74, a distinguished professor of chemistry and biochemistry at the University of Southern California, and Levitt, of Stanford University, were named Oct. 9 along with Martin Karplus of the University of Strasbourg in France and Harvard University.

Warshel received his bachelor's degree in chemistry from the Technion Institute in Haifa and his master's degree and doctorate in chemical physics from the Weizmann Institute in Rehovot. He joined the USC faculty in 1976.

Levitt, a native of Pretoria, South Africa, was a professor at the Weizmann Institute in the 1980s and reportedly took Israeli citizenship, the Times of Israel reported.

Karplus, a Vienna native, is the son of secular Jewish parents who were well respected in the Austrian capital. In 1938, he fled with his parents from the advance of the Nazis.

"The work of Karplus, Levitt and Warshel is groundbreaking in that they managed to make Newton's classical physics work side-by-side with the fundamentally different quantum physics," the Swedish academy said in a statement. "Previously, chemists had to choose to use either/or."

Also last week, Francois Englert, a Belgian Jewish professor at Tel Aviv University and a Holocaust survivor, shared the Nobel Prize in physics with Peter Higgs of Britain. Jewish Americans James Rothman of Yale University and Randy Schekman of the University of California, Berkeley, joined German-born researcher Thomas Suedhof of Stanford University in winning the Nobel Prize in medicine.

Reason to question validity of Diaspora Jews weighing in

is one thing, but weighing in on specific security and existential governance matters for which Diaspora Jews incur no personal consequences is quite another.

Veteran Middle East analyst Jim Lederman raised a vitally important point that goes beyond Rabbi Wolpe's observation. As Lederman explained: "All too often, because Diaspora Jews, by definition, do not participate in the daily internal Israeli debate, they do not even know what questions to ask that affect the lives of Israelis. For instance, "How are we supposed to rule ourselves?" is a question Diaspora Jews do not take part in... [and] in fact don't even know to ask.

"But let's assume theoretically that Diaspora Jewry could have a say in Israeli policy-making. If so, then they must participate in the entire daily internal Israeli political debate – not just one aspect of it. Not only that, they would have to do it in a way where they would have the same stakes and suffer the same penalties. Would they be willing, for example, to pay twice as much for gasoline, 170 per cent more for a car or 65 per cent more on some dairy products every day? And would they then be willing to turn all that extra money over to the treasury with no say in how it's spent – just as the Israeli public does? Or would they be willing to re-enact the most painful drama in the entire Torah – the Akedah – as many Israeli parents do every two weeks when they drop their child off at the bus, taking the child back to the army? The moment they kiss each other goodbye the parent knows, as Abraham did, that they have entrusted their child in an act of faith to a wholly unknown force whose real interest in the child and his or her safety is totally unknown."

Perhaps we in the Diaspora do not understand nor fully appreciate the uncertainty that is an inherent part of daily life in Israel. So, on life-and-death matters affecting Israelis directly, there is reason to question the validity of Diaspora Jews' "weighing in."

All Jews deserve seat at the table and their voices heard

In that case, former prime minister Ariel Sharon was "anti- Zionist" when he told a meeting of stunned Likud leaders, – the current Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu among them – in May 2003, "You want to remain in Jenin, Nablus, Ramallah and Bethlehem? The idea that it is possible to continue keeping 3.5 million Palestinians under occupation – yes, it is occupation, you might not like the word, but what is happening is occupation – is bad for Israel and bad for the Palestinians, and bad for the Israeli economy."

For that matter, Tzipi Livni, the current Israeli justice minister (in charge of relations with the Palestinian Authority), must be labelled "anti-Zionist" because she addressed Netanyahu in the Knesset with these words: "You have turned Israel into a weak, fearful state which is losing its friends in the world, which defies leaders of the free world, the source of its strength. Perhaps you have led Israel to this position out of weakness, due to your inability to make a decision and take a stand. You refuse to pay a political price for the peace process, [and] since your main interest is the coalition, you will not be able to make the right decisions."

Governments can be wrong and policies can be ill-advised, and when they are, we must say so and be heard. Actions by the Israeli government have an impact on Jews in the Diaspora as we experience anti-Semitism, boycotts and sanctions. Unless we have a voice, we cannot prevent or challenge misguided policies that have a negative impact on both Israelis and Diaspora Jews.

We deserve to have a seat at the table to ensure that all voices are heard and that Jewish organizations are truly representative of the entire Jewish Diaspora. It's in the interest of Israel's future and our future. Those of us with other points of view to those espoused by so-called mainstream Jewish organizations should work together to find a way to raise the voices of progressive Zionists in Canada.

Arie Raif is an Israeli political activist and former Israeli diplomat to Canada. He's currently vice-chairman and CEO of the Canadian Peres Center For Peace and a member of JSpace Canada.

Kosher chicken may be less safe to eat

JTA

NEW YORK — Kosher chicken might be less safe to consume than conventional poultry, a new study found.

Researchers with Northern Arizona State University examined the occurrence of antibiotic-resistant E. coli on four types of raw chicken: conventional, organic, kosher and those raised without antibiotics (RWA), all purchased throughout the New York area from April 2012 to June 2012. The study found kosher chicken, regardless of brand, had the highest frequency of antibiotic-resistant E. coli – nearly twice the amount in conventional products. It also found no difference in levels of antibiotic resistance between strains found on organic and conventional chicken.

The study screened for all types of E. coli strains, most of which are not harmful to humans, according to Food Safety News. The findings go against widespread consumer perception that kosher food is healthier and cleaner.

The reasons for the greater levels in kosher poultry than non-kosher are not clear. The authors wrote that their research "suggests that use of antibiotics in the kosher production chain is common and that it may be more intensive than use of antibiotics among conventional, organic or RWA practices."

The article suggested more studies are needed to test whether antibiotic resistance among kosher products is consistently higher than in other categories. The study was published on the F1000 Research website, which calls itself the first "open science journal for life scientists."

U.S. reduces military aid to Egypt

JTA

WASHINGTON — The Obama administration is suspending delivery of some "large scale military systems" to Egypt, but will maintain assistance that will help secure its border with Israel.

"The United States continues to support a democratic transition and oppose violence as a means of resolving differences within Egypt," said a statement released Oct. 9 by Jen Psaki, a U.S. State Department spokeswoman.

It added that the United States would "hold the delivery of certain large-scale military systems and cash assistance to the government pending credible progress toward an inclusive, democratically elected civilian government through free and fair elections."

The Obama administration has resisted pressure to cut aid to Egypt from some lawmakers and human rights groups since July, when a military coup ousted the elected Muslim Brotherhood-affiliated president, Mohammed Morsi.

It's against U.S. law to continue foreign aid following military coups, and Obama administration officials have been at pains not to use that word.

In recent weeks, however, as the Egyptian military has stepped up its crackdown on Brotherhood-affiliated opponents of the regime, the Obama administration has signalled it would reconsider aid.

Psaki in her statement did not say how much of the $1.5 billion in annual assistance – $1.3 billion of it in defence aid – would be cut, but she outlined areas where assistance would continue, suggesting that at least some of the defence aid would be diverted to civil society programs.

"The United States will work with the interim Egyptian government and Congress to continue to provide support that directly benefits the Egyptian people in areas like health, education, and private sector development," she said.

Defence assistance would continue in areas close to Israel's border, according to Psaki's outline.

"We will continue assistance to help secure Egypt's borders, counter terrorism and proliferation, and ensure security in the Sinai," she said. "We will continue to provide parts for U.S.-origin military equipment as well as military training and education."

Israeli officials had earlier last week urged continued western support for Egypt's military ruler, Gen. Abdel al-Sisi, seeing him as the best guarantor of the 1979 peace treaty with Israel.

Egypt's military rulers called the U.S. freeze on some forms of military assistance "errant in both substance and timing."

"The decision raises serious questions regarding the United States' readiness to provide constant strategic support for Egyptian economic and security programs," said a Foreign Ministry statement sent to reporters last Thursday by the Egyptian embassy in Washington.

Egypt's Foreign Ministry said the decision was "errant in both substance and timing, despite the fact that the decision is of a temporary nature and does not terminate or reduce the aid programs and that it was accompanied by assurances that the United States will continue to support the interim government in Egypt."

The statement said that Egypt remained "keen to maintain its good relations with the United States" but added that its internal affairs and security decisions would be taken in an "independent manner."

TEVA RESTRUCTURES: A worker leaves the Israeli pharmaceutical company Teva Industries in Jerusalem on Oct. 11. Teva announced last week that it's slashing its global workforce by 10 per cent – some 5,000 workers, including 800 in Israel – in an effort to make the company more efficient. (Flash90 photo)

Block remembered as a pillar in London

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Up until she was 66, Laya Block would cook Shabbat dinner every week for 30 or 40 hungry students.

She'd start on Thursday and when she was done – in her own kitchen, mind you – she'd pack up the chickens, chicken soup, kugels and salads and shlep them to the Chabad House in London, Ont., where she and her husband, Irving, a professor of philosophy at the University of Western Ontario, hosted the dinners.

Block's meals were famous among Jewish youths studying in London, and many would ask for the recipe for her signature dish – the homemade pareve vanilla ice cream that ended the meals, recalled Laya's daughter, Bassie Gurkow.

Block died recently at age 79 after being stricken with a brain tumour. Laya, also known as Lillian and Lilly, was laid to rest in New York, in the same cemetery as her parents and the Lubavitcher Rebbe, Mendel Schneerson.

A memorial service in her honour will be held in London's Jewish Community Centre, 536 Huron Street, on Sunday Oct. 20, at 3 p.m.

Gurkow vividly recalls the Shabbat dinners. You could count on a core of 10 to 15 regulars to attend, along with other students who'd come occasionally or even just once. There was never any need to publicize the gathering. News spread by word of mouth.

Her mother was meticulous in setting the stage for the dinners

"She was very dignified and gracious. When she set a Shabbat table, it was beautifully done," Gurkow recalled.

Back in the 1970s, Manuel Prutschi, who later served as a senior official with Canadian Jewish Congress, was one of the students who took part in the Shabbat dinners hosted by Laya and Irving.

"I don't think there was a student who went to Western who didn't go there," Prutschi said. "Shabbat there was like you were entering another dimension. It was something marvellous.

"They touched hundreds, thousands of students and cultivated in them Jewish identity and values.

"Some became religious, but all of them were touched by Lilly and her husband and they will always remember that."

A native of Brooklyn, N.Y., Laya and Irving moved to London in 1961 after consulting with Rabbi Schneerson.

Her father had other options, but "the rebbe directed them to choose this position," Gurkow said.

The Shabbat meals started small, as the family invited others to join them. "It just grew from there," she recalled.

When her older siblings approached nursery school age, her mother, who held a master's degree in education, opened Gan Gani Pre-School to accommodate them and others in London searching for a Jewish option.

The school is still in operation under Gurkow's supervision, though Laya taught there until she was 67. Gurkow estimates that 600 students have passed through the school's doors in its 50 years of existence.

When her brothers and sisters – she's from a family of eight – got older, her mom opened an elementary day school, the London Community Hebrew Day School. It's still in operation, though the family has no formal connection to it anymore.

Laya was also responsible for opening a mikvah, as well as organizing an annual lecture series that brought together women from all religious streams of Judaism, as well as members of Hadassah, for a gourmet dinner and an evening of discussion.

Rabbi Mordechai Silberberg, who heads Chabad House at Western, called the Blocks "leaders in the community."

Laya "came from an illustrious Chabad family... She was very impressive. Her persona was very dignified, very strong. She felt confident She had leadership skills and character. She was extremely responsible, organized and dignified."

Gurkow said the family is asking anyone with personal reminiscences of Laya to send them to the following email address: layablockmemories@gmail.com.

Watch company finds new customer in Israel

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

On Oct. 27, the U.S. Marine Corps (USMC) will hold its annual marathon in and around Arlington Va. More than 30,000 runners will take part – military and non-military – but only one, the 1775th marine to cross the finish line, will receive a special prize, a Marathon watch.

The Marine Corps, which was founded in 1775, is already quite familiar with watches from the Toronto-area company. Its soldiers have been issued with timepieces by Marathon Watch for years, but it's not the only armed force or police tactical unit to employ the company's well-built watches.

Marathon has been a supplier to the RCMP, and the Toronto Police Service's emergency task force is also a customer. In the United States, the Department of Homeland Security equips its personnel with Marathon watches. A "tactical distribution company," which supplies police and paramilitary forces with vests, boots, tents and other paraphernalia, acts as a middleman, supplying Marathon watches to customers around the world.

Mitchell Wein

Recently, the elite Israeli special forces unit, Duvduvan, signed on to acquire watches by Marathon.

At the family-run company's Richmond Hill offices, Mitchell Wein won't say how many watches the Israeli commando unit acquired – that information is classified – but he noted that the first time ever, Duvduvan granted a private company permission to use its logo in its watches.

The thick, heavy "diver's watch" chosen by Duvduvan has "IDF SF" engraved on the side and the unit's paratrooper wings logo on the watch face.

"They are so happy with it that it's the first time ever that the Israel Defence Forces' Duvduvan unit granted a licensing agreement," said Wein, the fourth generation in his family to work in the watch business.

Duvduvan, which means "cherry," is part of the Israeli paratroop brigade and is a highly sought-after unit that conducts risky undercover operations in enemy territory.

Like all the timepieces the company supplies to military customers, the watch sold to Duvduvan meets rigid specifications that far exceeds anything a civilian might require.

The diver's watch acquired by Duvduvan is good to a depth of 300 metres. Like other military-grade watches, they're tested for "very high specifications," Wein explained. They must pass a drop test, a vibration test, a shock test and meet other criteria to ensure the hands are always aligned and that the wearer can tell the time in all kinds of conditions.

Altogether, Marathon offers a collection of 12 to 15 different watches, along with a number of variations for each model.

"Our prices go from $150 all the way to $3,600," said Wein.

At the top end of the scale you'll find the "Chronograph Pilot."

"It's a special, dual movement watch with normal timing that can also be used as a stopwatch," Wein said.

Marathon also sells relatively simple mechanical watches, worn by everyday soldiers, as well as self-winding timepieces and a pilot's watch called the Military Navigator. With an adjustable outer ring, it gives accurate time for two time zones and has a special lens that remains flexible at altitude under extreme changes of pressure, Wein said.

Though the company is based in Richmond Hill and Wein is personally responsible for the watches' design and appearance, the timepieces themselves are engineered and assembled in the small Swiss city of La Chaux-de-Fonds.

The city is a hub of watch-making companies employing talented individuals. Given the tolerances demanded, the unique requirements and the made-to-order mechanisms, they're all hand crafted by Swiss watchmakers, Wein said.

The family has been connected to European watch-making for generations, explained Wein. Weinsturm Watch began business in 1904, later changing its name to Wein Brothers.

Even before the Russian Revolution, the family sold watches from Poland all the way to the Pacific Ocean, said Leon Wein, Mitchell's father. Part of the family also had a big importing business in the United States. In 1939, Mitchell's grandfather, Morris, founded Marathon Watch in Montreal. During World War II, the company supplied timing instruments to Allied Forces.

Over the years, Marathon expanded its line of watches and added other timepieces. The company benefited from a big order from the U.S. Army during the first Persian Gulf War in 1990-91.

"We bid on it and got the order," Leon said. "A 60,000 order changed to 120,000 watches in five minutes," he added. To satisfy the demand, the company employed extra watchmakers and at their peak, they were turning out 5,000 watches a week.

After that "we became more recognized as a brand name," Mitchell said.

As for the name, "Marathon," that was an idea hatched by Morris and Mitchell's uncle, Myer. They saw it as describing watches that were "best in the long run," Mitchell said.

Looks like the U.S. Marine Corps agrees.

YOUTH LEADERSHIP: NCSY and the Jewish Business Network (JBN) held its opening program recently at the home of entrepreneur and philanthropist David Cynamon, left. He's seen here with Or Gal, 17, a student at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy and a head of operations for JBN Executives for Teens. JBN was created in 2009 by NCSY alumni and in 2010 it launched a high school program. Members meet weekly to develop social action projects and hear from corporate leaders. The goal of JBN is to inspire the next generation of Jewish business leaders to connect to Jewish values. "It was inspiring and a privilege to host and meet with these young men who will one day be the future leaders of our community," Cynamon said.

A real-life missing persons mystery

This Great Escape: The Case of Michael Paryla
Andrew Steinmetz
Biblioasis

Nancy Wigston
Special to The CJN

Good news for fans of Andrew Steinmetz's award-winning Eva's Threepenny Theatre (2009 City of Ottawa Book Award winner, finalist for the 2009 Rogers' Writer's Trust Fiction Prize). His new book, which is moving, funny, dazzling and inventive, continues his Great-Aunt Eva's family saga. Nominated for the Hilary Weston Writer's Trust Prize for Nonfiction, this one's already a winner.

This Great Escape follows the trail of Michael Paryla, a mystery cousin found dead at age 32, in Beatles-era Hamburg. Once again, Steinmetz ventures into the Hansel-and-Gretel forest where his Mischling relatives dwelt. Michael was Eva's son.

The family was theatrical: Karl, Michael's absent father, was a well-known stage presence; his mother toured in a 1928 production of Bertolt Brecht's The Threepenny Opera. Her Jewish roots drove Eva and her husband from Nazi Germany in 1933, and she gave birth to Michael in Vienna. At humiliating cost, Eva bought the family's escape to Switzerland. Eva and Michael – he was 24 – later emigrated from a displaced persons camp to Canada.

"I knew two things about Michael growing up," Steinmetz says. "I knew he had been in the movie The Great Escape. I also knew he had died of an overdose." In the 1963 John Sturges hit (best remembered for Steve McQueen's motorbike scenes), Michael Paryla appears on screen for 57 seconds, "watched by millions yet completely unknown, eclipsed by Hollywood stars... He was a refugee from Nazi Germany, partly Jewish and the son of one of Austria's most celebrated left-wing actors, playing a Gestapo agent, a role reprised on thousands of televisions."

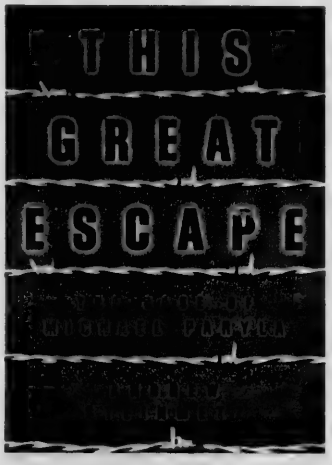
In the film, Michael moves along the train carrying escapees from Goering's Stalag Luft III, checking the papers of actors Richard Attenborough and David McCallum. (James Garner and Donald Pleasance jump off at his approach.) Michael does not appear in the film credits; he was a last-minute substitution.

"Spellbound" at first by his cousin's "fedora and trench coat" stereotype, Steinmetz later changes his mind. "I chide him, perhaps, for not feeling enough, for not being affected nearly enough by the past," he says now. "That's probably unfair of me." Following his cousin's trail to Germany (Michael left Canada to work as an actor in Germany), Steinmetz bumps into history everywhere he looks.

As Steinmetz pursues his elusive subject, he makes us aware of another Michael, one man playing another man's part. His clothes don't quite fit. The sleeves are too short. It's maddening. Obsessively watching and re-watching the film, Steinmetz brings us tantalizingly close to this man, discovered dead and alone after missing a 1967 curtain call. Suicide? Accident? Murder? As a detective, Steinmetz is astoundingly thorough.

What's remarkable is the growing connection between these cousins – even if only one can feel it. Steinmetz's long inability to create his signature – a sign of an "identity disorder" – is beautifully, honestly rendered.

Similarly, "if I look at his life," he says, "Michael was always forced to hide a part of himself. In 1935 Austria, it was his Jewishness; in wartime Switzerland, it was his immigrant status. In postwar Canada, it was his German roots. No wonder he became an actor."



The unstoppable Steinmetz takes German trains, reproduces diaries and letters, interviews relatives and film archivists, presents The Great Escape script and explains the truth that inspired it. He takes acting lessons, meets stern Germans and kind Germans, questions foreigners who feel unwelcome there but who welcome this curious Canadian. A medical librarian, he examines the history of often-lethal barbiturates. Google Translate hilariously delivers current German opinion on the Sturges movie: "Class film, shot in the never get bored."

Most movingly, perhaps, he conducts oral histories with friends of "Mike," the "blonde James Dean," whom they knew in Sault Ste. Marie.

"I found their testimony so poignant and so moving," Steinmetz reflects. "There was something about their sincerity, about the dignity and respect that they gave their words, a fragility and strength to their witness. And I thought to myself, this really has nothing to do with Michael [specifically]; what I feel and hear in their voices has everything to do with the human condition, which is extraordinary."

We end the book with similar certainty that Michael Paryla – actor, son, stateless soul, individual and symbol of his times – whatever the exact cause and nature of his final escape, was, in every sense, extraordinary, fully deserving of this long-delayed spotlight.

HEALING THE WORLD: The Hamilton Public Library hosted the photo exhibition Israel-Helping to Heal the World from Oct. 1 to 15. It featured several pictures of the work done by IsraAID, the Israeli non-governmental organization that provides emergency relief to areas in the world struck by natural disasters, and pictures from Save a Child's Heart that showed children from Gaza, the West Bank and various Arab and Muslim nations who received free cardiac surgery in Israel. The exhibit was organized by UJA Federation of Hamilton's public relations committee with the support of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs. Pictured at the opening, from right, are Hamilton Spectator editor-in-chief Paul Berton, PR committee chair Lorne Pinkelstein, CIJA vice-president Judy Zelikovitz and Irit Stopper, deputy consul general of Israel in Toronto.

Singer's latest CD a semi-autobiographical grouping

Marvin Glassman
Special to The CJN

Toronto singer/songwriter Donna Greenberg has made up for lost time since recording her first CD, Stranger, at age 50.

Since Greenberg recorded it in 2009, she has received so much praise for both the CD and her live performances that she has recorded three more CDs over the past four years.

Greenberg will showcase music from her four CDs, performing with her pianist and arranger, Jordan Klapman, in A Harvest Of Song concert Oct. 17 at Musideum.

Prior to recording Stranger, Greenberg excelled as a ballet dancer, choreographer and instructor with her company, Ballet Espressivo, which she founded in 2003. She still continues to teach adult ballet classes through her company.

"I always loved to sing and write music, but also loved the world of dance and have no regrets for beginning my music career later in life. I felt committed to realize my dream of recording my songs, proving that it is never too late to meet your goal", Greenberg said.

Although not signed with a major record label, Greenberg has hit the top sales charts as an independent artist in Canada. Her recording of Stranger has received airplay internationally on radio and been promoted on her YouTube channel.

Donna Greenberg

Greenberg is known for her rich voice, singing jazz standards as well as her own songs of dramatic ballads that speak of love, and can sing in English, French, Italian, Portuguese and Spanish.

Her latest CD, Burnt... and Toasted, is a semi-autobiographical grouping of 12 songs that was staged as a one-woman musical cabaret show in July at the Toronto Fringe Festival. Many of the songs were based on a romantic relationship that she described in song as a relationship of abuse, betrayal and lack of trust.

"I don't want to talk about the relationship, except to say that I have emerged as a strong person and have deep, mature lyrics to share with the audience. I tell the story of a woman, in character, not really me, who emerged from her pain as a stronger person fulfilling her dreams."

"In Burnt, she at first was singing in the third person," Klapman said, "but I worked with Donna to let her sing her heart out, and she connected immediately with the audience. I admire Donna for her courage to share her pain and journey with the audience.

"Donna's strength of projecting her voice with her emotional songs makes her an exciting performer," added Klapman, who has been Greenberg's music director and arranger since 2009.

Born and raised in Toronto, Greenberg developed her love of music from her parents' love of the Great American Songbook composers such as George Gershwin, Cole Porter and Richard Rogers. She studied English literature at the University of Toronto and received further training in music after graduating. While on a summer break, Greenberg toured Israel and worked on a kibbutz.

After working in the Toronto library system for 11 years, she founded her dance company and excelled, not only in performing ballet and choreographing dance, but also in creating short films on the ballet.

One of her films, I Can't Go On, is dedicated to her grandfather, who was a Holocaust survivor.

"The film, told totally through dance and music without the spoken word, is set in the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising in 1943. The two dancers portray Jewish resistance fighters who battled the Nazis against the odds of survival. I was proud not only to choreograph the dance, but to produce and direct the film as well."

Singer/songwriter Donna Greenberg performs in concert in A Harvest Of Song, with pianist Jordan Klapman, Oct. 17, 8 p.m., at Musideum, 401 Richmond St. W., in Toronto. Tickets are $20. For tickets, call 416-599-7323 or go to www.donnagreenberg.com.

How to start a dialogue through film

Rita Poliakov
Special to The CJN

Therese Shechter wasn't a virgin when she got married. And, at 47, she wasn't about to don a white dress, either.

"I remember thinking that I don't know why I would want to wear a dress that erases my sexual history," said Shechter, a documentary filmmaker releasing her latest film, How to Lose Your Virginity. "Because that's what it's meant to do. I thought that was a pretty good thing I was bringing to my marriage."

Shechter spent five years working on the film, which, far from a how-to video, explores the idea of virginity and its role in controlling female sexuality.

"I'm really interested in the idea of how we created our own identities as women, as opposed to how the society around us tried to tell us who we are," Shechter said. "I think one way that happens is through our sex lives."

How to Lose Your Virginity explores that hypothesis using humour and personal experiences. The film starts with the story of how Shechter lost her virginity.

"At the time I thought I was the oldest living virgin at 23. I really believed I had to find the perfect person, because whoever this person was, as soon as we had sex, I would become so deeply connected to them," she said. "By the time I hit 23, I thought OK, enough. I need to get this over with. I ended up having sex with the guy I was dating. It was incredibly uneventful.

"I was really pissed off. I thought, 'This is what all the fuss was about?' I was really mad I was sold this idea that having intercourse for the first time would change me forever."

Shechter, who grew up in Toronto and now lives in New York, raised $50,000 for the film through two Kickstarter campaigns. For the filmmaker, the successful campaigns proved there was a need for a film like How to Lose Your Virginity.

"I would hear people saying, 'It's about time we start talking about this stuff. It's about time we start being more honest about our sex lives,'" she said.

Even so, few people were willing to talk about the issue on camera.

"People really don't want to be identified when talking about their sex lives. We can't talk honestly about sex. It's really embarrassing and awkward. So I'm really grateful to the people who spoke on camera," she said.

The film includes people from all walks of life – from those who abstain from sex to those in the porn industry.

While the film has yet to be screened in Canada – its Canadian premier will take place Oct.25 at the St. John's International Women's Film Festival – it's currently showing in Israel.

"The organizations I'm working with [in Israel] are really excited about it. We're talking about a secular audience, unfortunately, because obviously a religious audience is going to have strict ideas about what constitutes [virginity]," she said, adding that Israel is a much more open society than North America.

"I think young people are a lot more sexual in Israel [in the secular community]."

Therese Shechter tries on "the big white dress."

Passages: Hy (Chaim) Burstein, who died in Toronto on Oct. 1 at the age of 85, discovered a passion for riding horses as a teenager and continued riding until he was in his late 70s. The retired plastics-industry executive was also the published author of Ride 'em Jewish Cowboy, a lively memoir about his equestrian experiences around the world, as well as several self-published titles.

Born to Russian-Jewish immigrants in Toronto in 1928, Burstein started his career as a truck driver in his father's burlap bag company on Simcoe Street. During a visit to Israel in 1959, he met his wife, Zuzek, a former Miss Israel, and proposed to her after five days. They were married three weeks later. She then gave birth to six children – five boys and a girl, including a set of twins – in less than six years.

Hy Burstein was sometimes known as "Riding Hy"

As he chronicled in his memoir, Burstein travelled the world seeking exotic trails and equestrian adventures. He was a regular herder at a large ranch near the Montana-Wyoming border, where he would help push thousands of cattle up the mountains to pasture in spring, then back down to market in the fall.

Once, on an African trail with a party of riders, the horses suddenly bolted as a lioness darted between the trees toward her cubs. On a riding excursion in Israel's Galilee region, he rode for several hours from the Vered HaGalil ranch down to Lake Kinneret. His guide kept a loaded pistol at his side at all times for security.

After the proprietor of the Montana ranch professed a dislike of Jews, Hy let the remark go but later asked him what he had against Jews. "They talk too loud and can be very noisy," came the reply. Hy responded that ranch guests on drinking binges had often kept him up all night with their loud voices "and believe me, they weren't Jewish. Besides, I'm Jewish." The proprietor offered a red-faced apology and added, "Those Israelis sure know how to fight a war."

Ride 'em Jewish Cowboy was published by Jerusalem-based Devora Publishing in 2004. Hy also wrote and self-published a novel, a screed on comparative religion, and a book about an anti-Semitic murder in Paris.

Appalled at the kidnap, torture and murder of teenager Ilan Halimi by a French-Muslim gang in 2006, Burstein visited the Paris suburbs where the crime occurred and hired the detectives who had worked on it to guide him through every aspect of the case. "By the time they dropped me at the airport for my flight back home, I possessed an insider's view of the case, complete with privileged details known only to the police," he later wrote.

Burstein kept horses on his family's 100-acre ranch in Caledon. He leaves his wife, Zuzek, his six children and their spouses, and 14 grandchildren.

NIGHT OF PUBLIC ART

Toronto's Nuit Blanche festival brought many Jewish artists and organizations out into the night Oct. 5. Pictured is My Virtual Dream, a joint installation by Baycrest Health Sciences and the University of Toronto. Inside the 60-foot white dome, participants were hooked up to machines that detected their brainwaves, which were used to create unique 360-degree "dreamscape" projections on the dome's interior. Weaving networks of women – in Israel and beyond

Lauren Lyons works with Israeli organizations that help marginalized women gain confidence and independence.

Videos, events and more on heebonics.ca

Special to the CJN

Lots of young women book an Israel trip after university, but for most, it's an arms-length experience: see the country, taste the food, indulge in the nightlife, then come back to start a career.

Torontonian Lauren Lyons did things differently. After graduating from OCAD University in 2005, she moved to the Holy Land for a volunteer internship with a feminist organization called Achoti. She found herself immersed, and "blown away by these women and their stories."

Achoti, founded in the 1970s as a feminist organization of Jewish women from Arab countries, had been expanding its mandate to include other marginalized groups, such as Ethiopian, Bedouin and Palestinian women.

Lyons helped develop an economic initiative with a group of Ethiopian women from Kiryat Gat, which has one of Israel's highest unemployment rates.

"Being in the peripheries in Israel can be a difficult thing," says Lyons.

Through traditional handicrafts, such as sewing and embroidery, Achoti helped train women in business and professional sewing, with the co-operation of Comme il faut, a high-end women's fashion company.

Soon, she says, "we realized something powerful was happening."

More than just businesses, the women began building relationships. Achoti held seminars to bring women together from communities all over the country.

"We started to create networks, exchange ideas," ostensibly about embroidery and sewing techniques, but also to "learn about each other," Lyons says.

When Lyons met Safa Younes, an Arab-Israeli social worker who wanted to start an organization like Achoti for Arab women, Lyons came on board at the Arous El-bahar Association for Women in Jaffa, with which she's still involved.

Arous El-bahar is the Arabic name for Jaffa and means "Bride of the Sea."

Through these organizations, "we started to find a pattern. A lot of women were doing the same things, [but they] weren't interconnected... Achoti is a leader in connecting all these women's groups, inviting them to conferences where we'd get all these women together in one place, doing activities, sharing their embroidery and traditional handicrafts," Lyons says.

"Underneath, it was very similar... Embroidery was connecting all these women together... stitching relationships back together. Some of these women had never met... They got to break down social barriers and prejudices."

The women, who are seen as the "lowest" members of Israeli society, she said, arrive at conferences and events "with an identity and... skills" to show off proudly, "and have people who want to hear about it, and learn from each other's experiences."

One of the most popular endeavours of Arous El-bahar are its Jaffa Peace Dolls.

Using eclectic and colourful donated fabrics, Arab and Jewish women collaborate to create delightful, cuddly dolls. Each one is unique and proudly sports a fabric heart.

"They're just adorable. All the kids really love them," Lyons says, adding that adults find them irresistible because of what they represent.

"It's just such a positive response."

Younes told the Jerusalem Post that "65 to 70 per cent of the women who have taken courses through Arous El-bahar have been able to find work" following their experience.

In 2009, with the help of grants from the Greater Miami Jewish Federation and the Jewish Women's Foundation of the Greater Palm Beaches, Achoti opened Israel's first fair trade store in Tel Aviv featuring the handicrafts of Arous El-bahar and similar organizations.

Though Lyons moved back to Toronto in 2010 and works for a custom home-building company here, her ties to the economically disadvantaged, exploited and abused women of Israel are stronger than ever.

She is still involved through a network of women's organizations that includes Arous El-bahar, Achoti, and the Rikmah Project, which promotes women's embroidery from Palestinian villages around Jerusalem.

Hundreds have been touched by these organizations, Lyons says. Many were virtually housebound before, and these projects make them "a part of something."

They're not only making money, but also sharing "their culture with the mainstream Israeli society... [expressing] who they are and what a rich culture they come from, instead of being just in the periphery."

Jewelry design, her major in university, is still a passion, and Lyons has recently collaborated on a line that incorporates Ethiopian embroidery with her own sterling silver designs.

But, fascinated by the often-overlooked lives and histories of these marginalized women, Lyons says her newest obsession is food – recipes and women's stories from all sectors of Israeli society.

"I'm a bit of a collector," she says. "I came back to Toronto and felt that I had discovered something, been given a gift."

Now, she's sharing these collected stories of "voiceless" women and weaving ever-larger networks.

Travelling back and forth multiple times each year, she's working on a book to bring together Israeli women's stories and recipes as part of what she appropriately calls a "tapestry."

"It's so important to share what's happening in Israel, the creativity, the diversity... the beauty," she says.

For more information about Achoti, visit achoti.com.

The Arous El-bahar's Jaffa Peace Dolls, which can be seen at facebook.com/Jaffadoll, are among the organization's most popular initiatives.

UJA Federation stands with the People of Israel

Funds support Emergency Preparedness and Normalization of Israeli Lives

By Dan Horowitz

Despite a relative cooling off period between Syria and the United States, the people of Israel still find themselves living under constant potential threat from the northern tip of the country to the south.

According to a number of Middle Eastern news outlets, Hezbollah has threatened to launch a rocket attack on the Jewish state if the U.S. intervenes in Syria's civil war, while, in the south, Hamas will not hesitate to initiate a new military confrontation against Israel if the Egyptians undermine their regime. UJA partner communities have been directly affected. Eilat has been hit by a number of rockets over the past year, launched from Sinai. Sderot continues to be on the front lines with Hamas. And then, of course, Iran is a constant source of concern.

"A nuclear armed Iran would pose an existential threat to Israel, an unacceptable danger to world peace and security, including the likely bid of a nuclear arms race in the Middle East, making everyone less secure," said U.S. Vice President Joe Biden.

Israel is a vibrant, strong country. At the same time, the reality is that innocent Israelis from Metulla to Eilat are living their lives under threats from terrorist organizations and resulting from hostile elements, both governmental and not, in bordering nations. The impact is not just on maintaining security and preparation against attack but also ensuring peace of mind.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is making certain that Jewish Toronto plays a leadership role in partnering with the people of Israel to assure both personal safety and normalization of life in an unstable region. To that end, UJA Federation is funding a number of initiatives, throughout the country, designed to ensure emergency preparedness and quality of life, including:

• Through its partner agency, The Jewish Agency for Israel, UJA is helping ensure that new immigrants all over the country are provided with gas masks to protect themselves, and their children, from potential chemical and other weapons.

• In its partner community of Eilat, UJA spearheaded the completion of a new emergency wing which just opened in Yoseftal Hospital, the sole provider of emergency medical services to residents of Eilat and the surrounding area. The next closest hospital is 250 kilometres north in Beersheva.

• In Sderot, a UJA-partner community that has been besieged by thousands of rocket attacks over the last decade, UJA supports after-school programs for children, keeping them safe and off the streets, after a short Israeli school day, until their parents return home from work.

• The Fund for the Victims of Terror offers immediate assistance to those in Israel suffering hardships as a result of terror attacks. The Fund has provided financial assistance to thousands of victims of terror and related disasters, including 230 families in 2012.

"We are partners with the people of Israel, through and through," said UJA's Campaign Director and Counsel, Steven Shulman. "There may be great distance between Toronto and Israel on a map, but none in our hearts. The people of Israel are the heroes but, as a leading Jewish community, we have a vital role to play in ensuring that Israelis are better prepared for emergencies and to take action that can minimize worries associated with living in a tough geopolitical neighbourhood. This is one of the many reasons all of us should be proud to be associated with UJA Federation."

I hear you – or maybe I don't

Senior Side of Life
Michael Gordon

It was one of those unusual clinics where I saw more than one case in which the exact same issue surfaced. It confirmed something I know to be true, but because I have residents in training with me, it gave me the opportunity to demonstrate to them an important component of geriatric care.

The first encounter was with a couple accompanied by two generations of family members. The couple lived at home with personal care help – each had some degree of cognitive impairment, but not enough to completely interfere with their reasonable and safe functioning as long as there was some supervision. I was interviewing the husband, and my resident was assessing his wife.

As I did my assessment, it became clear that the gentleman was quite hard of hearing. According to his son, however, he refused to wear his hearing aids because "they bothered him" and he had problems adjusting them.

The patient explained that he had "no problem with hearing," while at the same time, leaning toward me to hear my question or answer and turning to the son to repeat the question. I retrieved my office Pocket Talker, a portable amplifier that gives users the ability to hear more clearly in difficult listening situations.

I put the earphones on him and gradually increased the volume. Suddenly his face lit up when I asked if he could hear me, and he said, "Very well." He could now readily engage in a three-way conversation with his son and me using this low-technology device. The son agreed to borrow a device from the audiology department for a one-month trial before deciding to purchase one.

My resident was ready to review the wife's issues with me, her son and her husband. The resident told me about his assessment before we entered the room. In addition to mild dementia, he mentioned that she was quite hard of hearing, but had previously refused hearing aids. I retrieved the Pocket Talker, and as with her husband, her face lit up when she heard my questions. I looked at the son and the husband and said, "Maybe there's a two-for-one deal."

Later in the clinic, a different resident saw another patient. This resident had not been apprised of the previous patients' hearing issues. She recounted a history of progressive cognitive decline and said that the accompanying daughter had mentioned an apparent hearing impairment. The patient absolutely refused to go for a hearing assessment, said she did not want hearing aids, and, in any event, they were "a waste of money."

I repeated the same manoeuvre that I had used with the previous couple. Although not as dramatic, the way the patient responded to my questions clearly indicated that she could hear better with the device.

Since this was a first visit, I was uncertain about whether some of the apparent cognitive impairment may have been due to or aggravated by the hearing impairment. As I explained to the daughter when I said I was not yet sure of the degree of cognitive impairment: "If you can't hear it, you can't remember it."

In this one clinic, with three patients out of a total of eight, I had the opportunity to demonstrate to the young residents the importance of hearing when assessing cognition.

It can be hard to convince older people to utilize hearing aids or pay for them. Sometimes the small size and technical difficulties with them cause them to be abandoned. For many, a simple, inexpensive Pocket Talker may be a device that can be used either as an introduction to the benefits of hearing enhancement or may, on its own, solve the problem for an individual to enhance social communication.

Appealing appetizers – on the grill or in the oven

Daphna Rabinovitch
Special to The CJN

Hors d'oeuvres, it is said, are all about stimulating the appetite. Well, nothing curbs your appetite as well as your enthusiasm faster than ho hum, run-of-the mill appetizers. Hors d'oeuvres literally means "outside the work," which gives the hostess the liberty to serve appetizers that have no relation to her main course. Toasted bread slices (crostini, in Italian) are the perfect vehicle to whet your guests' appetites and to stir up some excitement in the kitchen. Better yet, why not make those pretty and tasteful morsels on the barbecue? The following recipes all take advantage of your outdoor grill, although they can easily be made under a broiler or in a preheated 400-degree oven as well.

GRILLED CAPRESE CROSTINI

1/2 ciabbata loaf, cut in half horizontally (about 10-in. long)
1/4 cup unsalted butter, softened
3 cloves garlic, finely minced
3 tbsp. finely chopped fresh basil
2 small tomatoes, sliced
4 oz. fresh Mozzarella, sliced
2 tbsp. balsamic vinegar

Mash together the butter, garlic and basil in a small bowl. Spread evenly on top of each ciabbata half. Arrange the tomato slices in a single layer on top of the butter. Top the tomatoes evenly with the mozzarella.

Grill the loaves directly on a preheated grill set over medium-high heat (or on a baking sheet in a preheated 400-degree oven) for about 6 minutes or until the bread is lightly toasted and the cheese has melted.

Drizzle the vinegar over the cheese. Slice into individual portions. Makes 4 servings.

A PEACH OF A CROSTINI

Fresh peaches last well into Indian summer, so why not feature them at the beginning of the meal. Paired with a sweet and herby Greek yogurt and topped with a peppery sprinkle, these crostini are well-suited to any meal that may follow.

2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
2 cloves garlic, minced
12 slices French bread, cut diagonally
3/4 cup plain Greek yogurt
1 1/2 tbsp. chopped fresh mint
1 tbsp. honey
pinch each salt and pepper
3 small ripe peaches
cracked black pepper

In a small bowl, stir together the oil and garlic. Brush over one side of the bread slices.

Grill the bread slices, oil side up, on a preheated grill set over medium-high for 3 to 5 minutes or until browned around the edges. Remove from the grill. (Or toast in a preheated 400-degree oven for about 5 minutes.)

In a separate small bowl, stir together the yogurt, mint, honey, salt and pepper. Dollop evenly on top of the grilled bread slices. Cut peaches in half; remove the pits. Slice thinly. Arrange two to three slices on top of the yogurt mixture. Sprinkle with cracked black pepper.Makes 4 servings.

MEXICAN CROSTINI

2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
2 cloves garlic, minced
12 slices French bread, cut diagonally
1 cup surimi or fake crab
3 tbsp. low fat mayonnaise
2 tbsp. chopped fresh coriander
2 tbsp. finely chopped green onions
2 tbsp. freshly squeezed lime juice
1/4 tsp. freshly ground black pepper pinch salt
fresh coriander leaves

In a small bowl, stir together the oil and garlic. Brush over one side of the bread slices.

Grill the bread slices, oil side up, on a preheated grill set over medium-high for 3 to 5 minutes or until browned around the edges. Remove from the grill. (Or toast in a preheated 400-degree oven for about 5 minutes.)

In a separate bowl, stir together the surimi, mayonnaise, coriander, green onions, lime juice, pepper and salt. Mound evenly on top of the grilled bread slices. Garnish each crostini with a fresh coriander leaf. Makes 4 servings.

CROSTINI WITH GRILLED AVOCADO

You may not have thought of grilling avocado before, but I can assure you that this fruit takes exceptionally well to heat. Brushing the avocado halves with a touch of oil before grilling not only ensures they won't stick but helps prevent the avocado from discolouring, much like an acid would.
2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil (plus 1 tsp. for the avocado)
2 cloves garlic, minced
12 slices French bread, cut diagonally
1/2 cup prepared red pepper hummus
1/4 cup finely chopped roasted red pepper
1/4 cup crumbled feta cheese
1 ripe avocado

In a small bowl, stir together the oil and garlic. Brush over one side of the bread slices.

Grill the bread slices, oil side up, on a preheated grill set over medium-high for 3 to 5 minutes or until browned around the edges. Remove from the grill. (Or toast in a preheated 400-degree oven for about 5 minutes.)

Cut the avocado in half, remove and discard the pit. Brush the remaining 1 tsp. of oil over both cut sides. Place the avocado, cut side down, on the grill (or on a grill pan). Grill for 2 minutes or until the cut side has grill marks on it and is warmed throughout.

In a bowl, stir together the prepared hummus, red pepper and feta. Spread evenly on top of the grilled bread slices. Slice the warm avocado into thin strips. Arrange the strips decoratively on top of the hummus mixture. Makes 4 servings.

BRISKET IN COFFEE BRANDY SAUCE

2 lg onions, sliced thin
1 6-7 lb. brisket
1/3 c bourbon
1/3 c molasses
1/4 c apple cider vinegar
1/2 c olive oil
1 tbl pepper
3 tblsp instant coffee mixed with 2 c warm water

Preheat oven to 350°. Scatter onions in roasting pan just large enough to fit meat. Place brisket on top of onions. Combine remaining ingredients in bowl, pour mixture evenly over meat. Cover tightly with foil, bake 2 hrs. Turn brisket over, bake uncovered 1 hr. Transfer brisket to cutting board, allow to rest 10 min. before slicing. Strain cooking liquids into small sauce pan, pressing hard on solids (discard them), reduce on high flame to 2 ½ c. Let brisket cool slightly. Slice thin against grain.

Skating legend hid her Jewish past

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

For Ellen Burka, figure skating not only provided a lengthy career as a successful coach and mentor, it saved her life.

Recently inducted in the International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame in Israel, Burka kept her Jewish roots a secret for years. She was lucky to survive the Holocaust, and when she immigrated to Canada in 1951, she found anti-Semitism all around her. As a Jew, she wouldn't have been accepted into the social clubs where top skaters trained, so she opted to pass as a Christian. She had her daughters, Astra and Petra, baptized as Anglicans. Petra went on to become world figure skating champion in 1965.

Ellen, now 92, never told her children of their Jewish heritage, that their grandparents had been deported to the Nazi death camp of Sobibor, where they were murdered, nor that other relatives met a similar fate. Instead, she told them they had been killed in a car accident.

"I did not want to tell my children that their grandparents were gassed. It's a terrible thing to tell them.

"I had to protect them," said Burka, who now lives in Toronto.

Burka would have met the same fate as her parents but for her excellence as a figure skater. Deported from her native Holland to the Westerbork transit camp, she was told to fill out a form setting out her occupation. Brash and proud of her achievements, she wrote, "Figure skating champion of the Netherlands."

It was not an idle boast. Before the war, she had been a tremendous skater, a natural who was pretty much self-taught. Starting out on wooden skates, "I learned it very fast," she said. Copying what she saw others do, she taught herself sit spins, camel spins and other skating moves.

By the time she arrived at Westerbork, she could accurately describe herself as a champion.

Federation endowment funds show big increase

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Endowment assets managed by foundations linked to North American Jewish federations increased by 7.6 per cent to $14.3 billion in 2012, according to a survey released earlier this month.

The Jewish Federations of North America (JFNA) survey compiled figures from 64 communities, including five Canadian cities that all enjoyed an increase in endowment assets.

Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa, Vancouver and Winnipeg account for more than $690 million of North American endowment assets, which include unrestricted funds, donor-directed funds and legacy gifts.

Five largest in Canada now worth $690 million

"There were a couple of difficult years with the global [economic recession] going on, but right now we're very pleased with our investments," said Andrea Freedman, president and CEO of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa.

"We are fortunate to have had some thoughtful and purposeful leaders a generation before us who took great pains to plan for the future of the Jewish community," she added.

According to the survey, the Ottawa Jewish Community Foundation's endowment assets totalled $67.8 million in 2012, up by $6.3 million over 2011; the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto enjoyed an $8.4 million increase to about $216 million, and the Jewish Community Foundation of Greater Vancouver was worth $31.8 million, up $4.3 million.

MNA Slams Charter

MONTREAL — The Parti Québécois is guilty of "moral bankruptcy" and of proposing "state-sanctioned discrimination," contrary to both the Canadian and Quebec charters of rights, as well as the United Nations' Universal Declaration of Human Rights, with its proposed charter of Quebec values, Liberal MNA Lawrence Bergman said at his nomination meeting at Montreal's Congregation Adath Israel last week. Bergman, 72, has been the MNA for the riding of D'Arcy McGee since 1994. Bergman, who was acclaimed, will be seeking a seventh term in what is widely expected to be a December election. The proposed charter would prohibit public workers from wearing visible signs of their religion.

JERUSALEM — A Canadian legal adviser to the UN peacekeeping mission on the Golan Heights was released after eight months in captivity, the United Nations said Oct. 17. Carl Campeau was kidnapped in February while working for the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force (UNDOF). Syria's state news agency, SANA, said he was kidnapped by "terrorists," the government's term for opposition supporters, in a Damascus suburb. Campeau was stationed at the UNDOF base on the Syrian side of the demilitarized zone separating Israel and Syria until he went missing. He was handed over to the UN, which said he's in good health.

Ex-Mayor Charged

SAN DIEGO — Bob Filner, who resigned as San Diego mayor amid sexual harassment accusations, was charged Oct. 15 in a case brought by three women. He was charged with one felony count of "false imprisonment by violence, fraud, menace and deceit," as well as two misdemeanour counts of battery. Filner, 71, who is Jewish, resigned after San Diego city council approved a deal under which he agreed to leave office by Aug. 30 in exchange for the city paying his legal fees in a sexual harassment suit brought by a former aide. Nineteen women accused him of acting inappropriately and sexually harassing them. Filner was the city's first Democrat mayor in two decades. He had been a 10-term congressman.

Consider Changing Offensive Names: ADL

WASHINGTON — Pro sports teams should seriously consider moving away from "the use of hurtful and offensive names, mascots and logos," the Anti-Defamation League said.

Abraham Foxman

But the final decision to change a team name "should come from the team's ownership with input from the fan base. It is up to them to decide to let go of this hurtful tradition," Abraham Foxman, ADL national director, said in a statement.

The statement was released Oct. 15 as the Jewish owner of the Washington Redskins, Dan Snyder, has come under increasing pressure to change the name of his professional football team.

Other teams have also come under fire, including the Cleveland Indians, whose hook-nosed, red-faced mascot, Chief Wahoo, has been called racist and offensive.

Teams such as the Redskins and the Indians "have a responsibility to be sensitive to the legitimate hurt that offensive names, mascots and logos cause," Foxman said. "Tradition matters, but tradition should not justify the perpetuation of such names and mascots."

The call came after U.S. President Barack Obama said earlier this month that if he owned the Redskins, he'd consider changing the name because it offends some people.

'Two Live Jews' three-time City Chase winners

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Among all the slimy, creepy, goofy, stomach-turning and ridiculous tasks Michael Miller has been asked to do as part of the City Chase Toronto races, the slimiest, creepiest, goofiest and most ridiculous was having a tarantula creep around his stomach for a full 60 seconds.

Miller has no fear of spiders per se. Regular, garden variety wolf spiders, for instance, pose no problem.

It's the big hairy ones that are somewhat problematic. And even if they weren't, who'd want a giant hairy spider traipsing around their stomach anyway?

Well, if winning the annual City Chase race is your goal, you put aside your fears, swallow your pride and push yourself to the outermost limits of what you're able to endure.

Miller did just that during the 2008 Toronto race in allowing the tarantula to dance a waltz on his belly, but it was well worth it. Along with his partner, Brian Greenwood, he is an intensely competitive individual who loves to win, no matter what the challenge.

Brian Greenwood, left, and Michael Miller celebrate their Toronto Scion City Chase victory.

And win they have. Miller and Greenwood, who go by the nickname "Two Live Jews," are this year's Toronto #1 Scion City Chase champions, beating 600 other teams. Competing together for 10 years, they've also won the 2008 Ottawa championship, the 2012 and 2013 Toronto events and on the weekend, they finished fifth in the Scion City Chase national championships in London, Ont.

Going into the event, they acknowledge they were long shots to come out on top – the winners of the Halifax City Chase are "super-runners" who have represented Canada internationally.

Still, they pledged to give it their best shot and rely on smarts to go along with speed to get the job done.

When someone in your family passes away, you want everything to be done right, according to Jewish tradition. When my mother died, I didn't know half of what these things were. Benjamin's spent time with our family, explaining the significance of every sacred ritual. More than that, they made it ours. It was a beautiful way to honour my dear mother's life.

Tunnels built at Gazans' expense

Israel's discovery on Oct. 13 of an elaborate 2.5-kilometre concrete-lined tunnel, built by Hamas from Gaza emerging close to an Israeli kibbutz 300 metres into Israel, underscores a predicament Israel faces not only with Hamas, but also with the international community.

For years, Israel has been under considerable international pressure to allow more building supplies into Gaza for housing and infrastructure projects to meet the needs of a rapidly growing Gazan population. Much of this material, including cement (used to make concrete), had been smuggled into Gaza through tunnels running between Gaza and Egypt at the shared border town of Rafah.

By PAUL MICHAELS

Some tunnels were sealed by Egypt's former Islamist president Mohammed Morsi following attacks on Egyptian security personnel in the Sinai by extremists believed to use Gaza as an exit and entry point. Since the Egyptian military's overthrow of Morsi in July, the pace of tunnel closures has accelerated dramatically. As a result, Israel has increased substantially the supply of a range of goods to Gaza, including cement. In fact, this is a process that expanded even before as a concessionary gesture to Turkey and as part of the reconciliation effort between Israel and Turkey in the aftermath of the 2010 Mavi Mamara imbroglio.

Still, Israel has long warned that permitting building material such as cement into Gaza would allow Hamas, an organization sworn to Israel's destruction, to siphon it off for construction of military bunkers and tunnels, like the ones dug into Israel. Hamas' aim is to carry out attacks and capture Israeli soldiers, as they did in 2006, killing two Israeli soldiers and capturing Gilad Schalit.

Given Hamas' extreme hostility, Israel's predicament is how to balance its humanitarian obligations to Gaza (still co-ordinated – despite Israel's 2005 withdrawal from there – with the UN at Israel's border crossings with Gaza) against its pressing security requirements.

Strategic and security analyst Ron Ben-Yishai wrote on Ynet Oct. 14 that "[Israel's] army revealed the discovery of the tunnel in order to show the international community, including Turkey's [prime minister, Recep] Erdogan, that Hamas is taking advantage of Israel's decision to ease restrictions on Gaza in order to build terror tunnels."

Israel's military has uncovered three tunnels this year alone. How many more are there? And what risks do they pose to Israelis, civilians and soldiers alike, near the Gaza border?

It's also the scale of this recently discovered tunnel that raises concern. According to preliminary Israeli estimates, up to 800 tonnes of concrete consisting of 25,000 custom-designed slabs were used in the tunnel's construction. Buried about 20 metres deep, it allowed people to walk upright between walls lined with electrical and communications cables. It cost millions of dollars to build.

Ha'aretz's Gili Cohen cited the reaction of Maj.-Gen. Sami Turgeman, head of Israel's southern command: "'Hamas is spending tens of millions of dollars on the tunnels instead of taking care of the population and building schools, industry and employment.'"

That's the observation the international community should be paying attention to, though Israeli officials aren't holding their breaths.

Hamas officials, feeling no compunction at all about imposing deprivations on their own people – there's always Israel to blame – have bragged about their devotion to the tunnels. According to Elhanan Miller (Times of Israel, Oct. 13) Moussa Abu Marzuk, deputy head of Hamas' political bureau, posted the following comment on his personal Facebook page: "The tunnel which was revealed was extremely costly in terms of money, effort and blood. All of this is meaningless when it comes to freeing our heroic prisoners."

In the meantime, with the organization terribly short of cash, Hamas leader Khaled Meshal has recently visited Turkey for a meeting with Erdogan and plans to be in Tehran this month looking for support including financial aid – this at the very moment Iran is looking to get the West to relieve biting economic sanctions over its nuclear program.

Pew and the hope of Abraham

The recent Pew Report on American Jewish Identity has been compared to the Flood of Noah. But it's important to recall that Jewish life has not been determined by numbers and mere survival, but by vision and values rooted in the hope that Abraham came to bring to the world.

Looking at U.S. trends may give Canadian Jews a lens to partially anticipate what lies ahead. One-fifth of U.S. Jews identify themselves only by background. The rate of intermarriage remains very high, particularly among those who have little connection to Jewish community. They are less likely to be raising children as Jews than those whose identity is primarily religious.

Guest Editorial

Most say being Jewish is primarily a matter of ancestry and culture. Denominational identification is weakening. About three in 10 say they are "just Jewish." Jews who have day school and Jewish camp experiences have higher rates of commitment and retention than others within the same movements.

Young Jews are rewriting the norms of behaviour that have long characterized Jewish life. They're marrying later, having fewer children, connecting less to Jewish institutions and Israel, and choosing a "sovereign self" filled with pride, but only partially engaged in community.

Abraham, who appears in our Torah cycle as we think about Jewish demography, was counting his descendants from the beginning. He represents a hopeful revolution. The saga of Abraham is about going against common expectations.

Abraham is not only a noble warrior who stands apart from the Mesopotamian culture, he is deeply concerned with building a people from his own flesh. The Pew report points to pride in Jewish identity and attachment to Israel. Although the content of that pride is thin, can we galvanize that pride to construct a more substantive identity?

Pew respondents said that leading an ethical and moral life is essential to being Jewish. These are central values to Judaism, but are not unique to Jews. Can we strengthen the core of home, synagogue, school and camp to enable us to face social integration?

The metrics of intermarriage can't be ignored. But those who do connect to community and tradition are more likely to raise Jewish children. Can we acknowledge the challenges of intermarriage by developing programs for single Jews to meet each other, actively encouraging conversion, and supporting mixed families as they raise Jewish children?

Following the 1964 Look Magazine article, "The Vanishing American Jew," Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel declared, "Our community is in spiritual distress, and our organizations are too concerned with digits. The significance of Judaism does not lie in being conducive to mere survival, but in being a source of spiritual wealth and source of meaning to all peoples." Can we draw on Jewish wisdom to bring meaning to our civilization?

Prof. Jonathan Sarna has pointed to many creative reversals, unexpected developments in Jewish life in earlier generations. There are many possibilities for innovation to build a Jewish future. Jewish life is built on the past, but pointed forward. What can we do that will influence the yet to come?

Abraham and Sarah represent hope despite demographics. Rather than despair, can we share a love of living and learning with hope that others might find meaning in the heritage of Abraham and Sarah?

Dry Bones THE TIP-OFF!

Fogel's methods don't work

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, assumes that good advocacy consists of talking to the political elite, keeping your head down, and not offending the public with Jewish and Israeli rights and needs ("We can't have it both ways," The CJN, Oct. 3). His method does not work. Most importantly Fogel does not acknowledge that evil propaganda has always been used to soften up the public before the oppression or expulsion of Jews.

Fogel assumes that protesting simply feeds the egotistical needs of neurotics. Courageously standing up and protesting for Judeo-Christian, democratic values and showing the public that he cares does give the protester a good feeling of having done something of value – something for Judaism, Israel and Canada. It is the public, not the "echelons of power" that needs to know about the values of Israel and Judaism.

Fogel's suggestion, that only speaking to political leaders is effective, is shortsighted, wrong, and unfortunately mainly intended to vilify those who disagree with his approach. Fogel is trying to split the Jewish community into competing factions. I expect much more from his unofficial Jewish leadership.

Why publish Joe Oliver?

LET THEM GO...

Ron Arad, Zachary Baumel, Zvi Feldman, Guy Hever, Yehuda Katz

It is baffling that The CJN still publishes regular columns by Natural Resources Minister Joe Oliver ("Canada-Israel energy ties hold great promise," The CJN, Oct. 10). Oliver adds little to the paper with his repetitive adulation of the Conservative government.

Worse is Oliver's support of the government's cuts to refugee health care. Oliver has publicly proclaimed that refugee claimants were previously receiving care "superior" to Canadian citizens and residents – not true. Refugee claimants in various categories who are lawfully within our borders, following the rules, are being virtually denied all care including prenatal care, treatment for heart attacks and chemotherapy for cancer.

Oliver represents a government whose refugee policies stand in contradiction to Canadian values and especially to Jewish values. Jews know well enough the consequences of a government that is hostile to refugees and Oliver's support for the current policies places him outside the natural empathy for refugees arising from Jewish historical experience. Enough of Joe Oliver.

Public apologies increase interest

A recent letter ("Exhibit caused too much damage," The CJN, Oct. 17) on the display of children's art from Gaza display at the Hamilton Public Library is misguided.

Some may prefer to react to this issue by vocally denouncing the library and demanding public apologies. While this may be emotionally satisfying, it has been shown to generate a buzz of controversy that only increases media attention for the anti-Israel exhibit.

In contrast, UJA Federation of Hamilton and its public relations committee undertook a strategic response to the exhibit by pointing out its dubious content (which led to its relocation to the exhibit display area on the 4th floor), ensuring the venue adopted a policy that prevents future exhibits from misusing its premises, and taking the opportunity to share Israel's positive achievements in a way that resonates with average Canadians (who care very little about the Middle East conflict).

I was proud to attend the federation's "Israel: Helping to Heal the World" photo exhibit at the library, and was encouraged to see the presence of 150 local residents (including elected officials), as well as the overwhelming expressions of support from the Hamilton Jewish community. It reminded me that our advocacy should always be guided by strategy and logic – not emotion.

Federation does unify

We recently read the letter ("Community divided by JCC closure," The CJN, Sept. 18) accusing UJA Federation of Greater Toronto of dividing Toronto's Jewish community by allowing the demolition of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.

We were members of the old "Y," and while we were sad to see it replaced, its time had passed. When the Prosserman JCC opened, we enrolled our children in preschool and joined the fitness centre, and we could not be happier with the overall experience. When we look at our community, we see nothing but growth.

UJA Federation has shown great vision by opening the Prosserman JCC, as well as the Schwartz/Reisman Centre in Vaughan and transforming the old Bloor Y into the new Miles Nadal JCC. All told, those three institutions alone engage more than 12,000 individuals. If that's not the definition of unifying the community, we don't know what is!

We must retool our communal agencies to meet new needs

The Pew survey should spur us to action

Seymour Epstein

I readily agree with the comments made in The CJN last week by both Charles Shahar and Randall Schnoor that the findings of the recent Pew study of U.S. Jews are not a picture of Canadian Jewry a generation from now. The myth of our being a generation behind American Jewry has been shattered by the experience of the past 20 to 30 years. We don't look like the American Jewish community of a generation ago. The American Jewish sociologist Steven Cohen emphasized that point when he studied the Toronto community several years ago.

Seymour Epstein

However, as much as our historical past and our present situation is different from that of American Jewish communities, there's no reason to be complacent about our future as a creative and contributing part of the Jewish world. There was a time when "Jewish continuity" was the mantra of the organized community, the idea being that Jewish survival was the goal and that the community was best served by identifying Jews who cared enough to live as Jews. If the Pew study teaches us anything, it's that Jewish identity is not enough and that survival is not a sufficient goal for the Jewish People.

The study points to 32 per cent of Jews born after 1980 who consider themselves Jews of no religion. The idea of being a Jew without religion is not new, even though many of these millenials might think it is, given their scant knowledge of Jewish history. Ever since the European Enlightenment, there have been Jews who identified nationally and culturally, even linguistically, without seeing themselves as a religion. The difference is that the early maskilim (enlightened Jews) had deep knowledge of classical Jewish sources and knew what they were rejecting. Many of them also attempted to fill the new Jewish vacuum with innovative content other than religion. Political Zionism is a decent example.

When Jews arrived in North America in their varied waves of immigration, the non-Orthodox attempted to accommodate their Judaism to the modern urban settings they inhabited. (Even the Orthodox made compromises that they might not admit to now.) Thus grew the short-lived secular movements, Reform Jewry, the Conservative movement, B'nai Brith, the defence organizations and federated communities. Those were all respectable solutions to Jewish needs of the time. What the Pew survey points to is that these institutions no longer resonate with considerable portions of the current Jewish population. Did you notice that the Conservative movement, which once represented the majority of non-Orthodox Jews in the United States, came in at 18 per cent of respondents?

And this is where we Canadian Jews should take note. We, too, have large sectors of our Jewish population that have no identifying signs. They don't contribute to Jewish charities, don't belong to a Jewish community centre, are not involved in synagogue life, and don't send their children to any form of Jewish schooling.

In a community such as Toronto, they might constitute as much as 60 per cent of the Jewish population. While the Toronto Jewish community is very strong at the centre, peripheral Jews on the edges are weak in Jewish identity. And these Jews who don't show up on Jewish radar are not all Israelis and Russian-speaking Jews. Many of them are natives who are indifferent, disaffected and disenchanted.

A group of children study at a Jewish day school in this undated photo from the Canadian Jewish Congress archives.

Israelis, Jews from the former Soviet Union and natives all require our concern – from where they stand, not from where we preach. Because we at the centre don't see them in our synagogues and boardrooms, we sometimes deny their existence, but the gap between Jews recognized by the census and the numbers in synagogues, schools and UJA records proves their existence. It's a bit like God in our tradition. We never questioned His existence. It was His presence in our lives (or the lack of it) that concerned us.

A creative and developing Jewish life requires both identity and literacy. The great failing of most of the modern modes of North American Jewish life has been in the domain of Jewish literacy. It's frightening how such a highly educated mass of people can be so abysmally ignorant of Jewish literature, history and values. A writer I like once said that the problem with Jewish protests against anti-Semitism is that most Jews don't know too much about their Semitism!

The Pew survey should inspire both American Jews and the Canadian Jewish community to re-think our response to our current situation, which is more post-modern than modern, and to retool our communal agencies to meet new needs. It's likely that organized religion as we know it will only serve a small segment of Jews, and those new modes of identification need to be imagined.

Israelis are slowly rediscovering their literary and historical roots and are reclaiming classical texts from the religious, while remaining secular. There must be fresh portals for those who see themselves as Jews, but lack any content to make that claim authentic.

Seymour Epstein is a former director of the Toronto Board of Jewish Education.

Maybe it's time to welcome converts

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

It was a perfect Vancouver day for building a sukkah. The Hebrew school dads gathered and began to build it, under the direction of one of the sons.

(Their kids made sukkot out of gingerbread and candy with sprinkles – sort of like a good-witch-in-the-woods house. It was gone before the parents arrived.)

"You know," someone said to me, "not one of the people building that sukkah was born Jewish."

Not one dad born Jewish? Every man a Jew by choice – JBC?

What's going on here?

There's much hand-wringing every time a report on Jewish affiliation comes out. Will North American Jews disappear, leaving only a cadre of haredim to carry the flag, so to speak? Who will save us? Help!

Well, as Fareed Zakaria says every week on his CNN show Global Public Square, here's my take.

During Second Temple times, Judaism, a licit religion in the Roman Empire, became a vigorous, proselytizing religion. Early Christian authors of what would become the New Testament were aware of this, lamenting that the Pharisees would cross land and sea to convert one proselyte. In other words, Judaism was cutting into their territory.

We know that within the Jewish community, God-fearers were recognized, those – we assume men – who, not going all the way to conversion (maybe because it involved circumcision), were attached to Jewish communities, perhaps through their wives.

It was left up to the rabbis to create, as they wisely did, a mechanism for conversion, since biblical modes of attachment – the wife became an Israelite by marrying into a tribe – was no longer a possibility. What probably brought the expansion to a halt was the destruction of the Temple, the Jewish homeland and the resultant exile.

Today, it's considered necessary to reject initial approaches made by a potential convert, ostensibly to make sure the request is sincere. Given the past 2,000 years of Jewish history, one can see why there would be institutional reluctance to begin anew a process of attracting converts.

But maybe we need to rethink that reluctance. Why be afraid to showcase the attractions of Judaism? Those people putting up the sukkah were certainly enthusiastic. They were also a mixed bag. Some had grown up in a robust Christian tradition, while others came with absolutely no religious experience whatsoever.

Yet all were bound by a commitment they made to a religion, culture and history that's so rich, so inviting and so different from anything else.

It's not that we should begin to propagate a version of Judaism lite, but we could try to find out what, besides a potential or existing mate, brought them to the decision to convert. What have they found that satisfies them? What are their expectations? What do they enjoy learning about in the sea of Jewish thought and life?

Surely there are things we can learn from JBCs that would make our institutions stronger when it comes to meeting the needs of potential intermarriages, as well as those that have already taken place, so that the converting partner can see what wonderful things are available to him or her.

I realize there are many, many problems with probing peoples' personal choices and innermost emotions about such a step. But my goodness, we survey every other little facet of a person's life, and with Facebook, Twitter and such glitter, people are much more open about their personal choices and opinions than ever before.

People come to explore Judaism not just for the sake of marriage. Single folk are also attracted by its sense of a strong community, high ideals and traditions.

As an aside, I see that our rabbi is actively inviting people to explore Judaism via his information and conversion class.

So what holds us back from finding out what attracts people to our community and what our synagogues are doing to meets these needs, or, conversely, what are they doing that repels an approach? We'll be surprised to find out that becoming Jewish is for many people a fine idea, one that would stand them, and any subsequent family, in good stead – and strengthen the existing community in the bargain.

We should be proud of what we have, and open to those who are inquiring, yet unsure. Bring them in. There's plenty of room in the boat – er, sukkah.

Me, MAC and Marois

Norma Raumel Joseph in Montreal

I want to tell you about my experience with MAC. No, not a Big Mac, and not my MacBook Air.

I intend to write this column about my use of cosmetics. I want to use the specific example of MAC cosmetics to explore how much we tolerate xenophobia. Quebec's proposed charter of values and its supposed values are my ultimate target.

I've been a customer of MAC for many years. I like the product, the store is located conveniently near my office and the company makes a series of items that are long-lasting, so I can wear them on Shabbat. Added to all that, MAC recycles and has a very good incentive policy.

However, recently, I decided to stop buying the product. In fact, I won't step into the store anymore. This summer, I received advertisements for new products from MAC that were produced in French only. Why? MAC is willing to sell to anglophones. It wants our money, so why can't it advertise in our language?

I immediately went to the store and told the manager my thoughts. The law in Quebec is clear: the French language must be paramount, but English can appear. Why should businesses be stricter or more restrictive than the law? The minute we go overboard, we yield our political and language rights. We create the platform for further exploitations and misapplications or manipulations.

Eventually, we get a government that feels it can do anything, and big business stands back and complains that it's losing business. What can we do? Stop them at every turn. Not just by signing petitions. I have very little faith in those. And not just by writing letters to the editor. That's just wasteful. We write letters to the Gazette. Who reads those letters in the English newspaper? We do, not the Parti Québécois.

I know nobody at MAC cared about my absence as a customer. The store manager asked me to call the main office. I did. I got a phone apology. Nonsense. They don't care. But if more of us stopped buying at stores that only send French flyers and then let storeowners know why we're not shopping there, maybe it would have an effect.

We need to let our voices be heard in a myriad of places, including French newspapers.

What values does the charter represent? To be truly secular, the document would profess freedom of religion, freedom from religious persecution and domination and the freedom to practice religion. This proposal displays none of that. It doesn't indicate any understanding of a democratic secular government, only a fear of one religious community and a misguided sense of gender equality.

If the government truly was worried about women and their place in society, then legislation regarding gender would focus on economic inequalities and not what women choose to wear. Telling women what they're allowed to wear at work is a form of hegemonic control and of denying them agency. Who's to know that the hijab is more dangerous than the stiletto heel or the sheitel? What silliness.

And when the one woman in the Bloc Québécois is expelled because she utters a different opinion, is that a sign of allowing women freedom? Or do we have a government that only allows women freedom if women agree with them. That's not freedom. That's repression. Unacceptable.

Worst of all is the hidden agenda of Islamophobia. The PQ government playbook is anti-Muslim. It's unhealthy, anti-human rights, undemocratic and will lead to further abuses. It represents a monolithic view of who is legitimately a Quebecer, pushing all others out. And we Jews will stand with the "others" no matter how many centuries we have been here, no matter how many inroads we have made to be friendly and co-operative.

Finally, what is it really all about? The Marois government has governed poorly. Her record on education, health and the economy is abysmal. Floating this useless charter now has removed key issues from the political agenda and given her a new discussion platform. We have roads and bridges that are falling apart. Our best universities are failing. Waiting lists in the hospitals are health risks. And we're worried about head coverings?

Something is amiss in Quebec!

Multifaith trip to Israel planned for 2014

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Building on the success of a multifaith trip to Israel in 2011, a group of Jews, Christians and Muslims will travel to the Holy Land next March to gain new perspectives on the three major monotheistic religions, as well as the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"The Path of Abraham," so-called because Abraham is seen as a central figure in the texts of all three religions, is a nine-day tour meant to provide opportunities for participants to see each religion through another lens, said Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, spiritual leader of Beth Tzedec Congregation and a co-leader of the trip.

"Because we are seeing it through other people's eyes, or with other people, it opens us up to their experience as well," he said.

Ontario Multifaith Council president Iman Abdul Hai Patel – who is leading the trip along with Rabbi Frydman-Kohl and fellow co-leaders Father Damian MacPherson, director of the Office of Ecumenical and Interfaith Affairs for the archdiocese of Toronto; Rev. Karen Hamilton, secretary general of the Canadian Council of Churches, and interfaith and diversity advocate Judy Csillag – said this trip will focus on the commonalities in the three Abrahamic faiths, and promote messages of peace.

"The Path of Abraham" leaders, from left, Iman Abdul Hai Patel, Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, Rev. Karen Hamilton, Father Damian MacPherson, and interfaith and diversity advocate Judy Csillag, are planning to bring a multifaith group to Israel next March.

"There is not just history there, there is spirituality. For people to visit Israel, it's spiritually uplifting… From the Jewish community, many people go to Israel, but going on this trip is a unique experience," Iman Patel said.

"We also hope to bring a message of peace to Israel and Palestine and show how we in Canada are living together... that we are in harmony with each other."

The itinerary includes visits to Bethlehem, Hebron, Nazareth, the Galilee, the Temple Mount, the Western Wall, the Golden Mosque and Haram al-Sharif, Yad Vashem, the Church of Nativity and the Church of the Holy Sepulcher.

Participants will also meet with religious leaders, Holocaust survivors and political figures, including a representative from the Palestine Liberation Organization's negotiations department.

"In this itinerary, we will be going to a [Jewish] settlement and to a Palestinian refugee camp," Rev. Hamilton said.

"So often, when people go to Israel and the Palestinian territories, they see one particular perspective or another," she added.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said this tour allows Jews, most of whom would not venture into Palestinian areas, to "hear from Palestinians about their experiences and similarly, Muslims and Christians are able to hear from residents of Gush Etzion about why they are there."

Following the trip, participants are expected to attend interfaith dialogues to explore their newly gained perspectives.

"Of course, the conversations are very tough," Rev. Hamilton said.

Recalling the 2011 trip, in which 56 people took part – 23 Christians, 15 Jews and 18 Muslims – Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said there were experiences that highlighted some of the challenges in the region.

"When we were in the Temple Mount area, Christians and Jews were told [they are] not allowed to pray here. Only Muslims are allowed to enter the mosques. Suddenly, there is a real sense of exclusion," he said.

On the other hand, there were other experiences that were unifying.

When the group visited the Kotel for Kabbalat Shabbat, "even those who have serious questions about Israel and the Palestinians found themselves dancing with soldiers," he said.

Rev. Hamilton recalled visiting the Church of Nativity, where it's believed that Jesus was born.

"One of the Muslim women, in a hijab… started to cry. She was just beside herself in the best kind of way because there is more about Mary, the mother of Jesus, in the Qur'an than there is in the New Testament… She was just overwhelmed to be standing in the spot where Mary gave birth to Jesus," she said.

For more information or to register for the trip, contact Csillag at judycsillag@rogers.com.

Student raises awareness of lymphedema

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Leora Nash, a 15-year-old student at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto was diagnosed with primary lymphedema in her right leg when she was four.

Leora Nash

"I had to receive special weekly massages that brought the swelling down, so I could wear a custom-made knee-high stocking," Leora tells The CJN.

Few have heard of primary or secondary lymphedema, including those at risk for developing the condition. The majority of people diagnosed will have secondary lymphedema and are cancer survivors.

It is rare to have primary lymphedema, and even rarer to have pediatric primary lymphedema, like Leora.

Lymphedema is a chronic infection often associated with excessive swelling, because the lymphatic system fails to drain fluid, cells and protein away from tissues within the body. It is often a complication arising from the treatment of various cancers and melanoma.

Lymphedema affects some four to five million people in North America, including some 300,000 Canadians. If left untreated, there is a risk of loss of limb function, as well as chronic infection. The Lymphedema Association of Ontario receives no government funding.

Treatment consists of compression therapy, bandaging, pressure garments, skin care to prevent infection, and manual lymphatic drainage massage performed by a certified lymphedema therapist.

"I still remember the day Leora got the stocking – I was so worried she would hate wearing it – but she thought it was amazing! 'It gives me super-powers,' Leora said, jumping up and down. That was a big relief for me," recalled Janice Goldberg, Leora's mother.

"Leora began exhibiting episodes of pain starting at age six," Goldberg said. "We noticed that she would have discomfort after a lot of walking or an increase in activity during family outings.

"At age eight, she had a week of increasing, unmanageable pain that resulted in an admission to Sick Kids' Hospital for a lymphedema-related cellulitis infection. The episode triggered the development of neuropathic chronic pain in her foot. She was helped by the chronic pain team at Sick Kids and we also sought care for her at Boston Children's Hospital.

"Over time, Leora learned to manage her pain using a toolbox of strategies. Her neuropathic pain dissipated and she was no longer affected as severely."

When she was 12, Leora received a copy of The Big Book of Lymphoedema from England. "This book is for kids, and illustrates what lymphedema is with bright pictures and activities," Leora said.

Today, "The Big Book for Kids" is an outreach program in collaboration with the Hospital for Sick Children's department of rehabilitation services. The Big Book of Lymphoedema is provided to each newly diagnosed and follow-up patient to help them understand the changes that will happen to their body and prepare them to cope with this life-long condition.

On the last weekend of September, the Lymphedema Association of Ontario held its annual fundraising five-kilometre walk in five different cities across Ontario and raised almost $23,000 for research.

Pro-Israel transit ads appear in Vancouver

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The pro-Israel group StandWithUs Canada posted ads in Vancouver public transit stations Oct. 14 to counter anti-Israel ads that have been running since the summer.

Ten TransLink stations will display the pro-Israel posters for a month to counter the anti-Israel posters currently at these sites and on 15 Vancouver buses.

"We believe there are many people who will look at the anti-Israel signs and go away thinking that's the truth about Israel, because prior to our poster campaign, there was nothing to refute the lies," said Meryle Kates, executive director of StandWithUs Canada. "And if we've studied history, we know the propaganda campaign can change peoples' minds."

The StandWithUs ads consist of two different posters. The first depicts Jewish loss of land from Biblical times to the present by juxtaposing a map of the ancient Jewish kingdom circa 1000 BCE, a map of the land designated as the Jewish homeland by the League of Nations in 1920 and a map of the much smaller Israel of today.

The second ad shows pictures of Israeli and Canadian children waving their national flags, celebrating the shared values and freedom both countries enjoy.

The controversial "Disappearing Palestine" ads, by contrast, sponsored by a coalition of anti-Israel groups led by the Canada-Palestine Support Network, show what the group says is the shrinking territory of "Palestine" since 1946.

"The anti-Israel ads distort facts," said Roz Rothstein, CEO of the 12-year-old U.S.-based parent group StandWithUs International.

"They presume there once was an Arab country called 'Palestine,' when in fact no such country ever existed prior to the one being considered today. Conversely, there has been a continuous Jewish presence in the land of Israel for three millennia, and the League of Nations recognized the Jews' historical connection to the land, which is why it carved out the Palestine Mandate as the Jewish homeland."

StandWithUs has countered similar anti-Israel ad campaigns over the past six years in a number of U.S. cities.

Rothstein said the anti-Israel posters in Vancouver are pretty similar.

"It's the same junk, the same twisted information that omits important context and distorts the land issues," she said.

"These anti-Semitic campaigns are showing up in books, movies and boycott campaigns, and the people behind them are relentless. They apply the same technique and ideology internationally. There has to be someone saying 'This is not OK, it's inaccurate and it will not lead to peace.'"

Rothstein said she first saw the "Disappearing Palestine" maps in New York and that she believes they were conceived by Alison Weir, the founder of If Americans Knew, a group that describes itself as "a non-profit dedicated to accurately informing Americans."

"This distortion that accuses the Jewish people of having nothing and taking everything away from a Palestinian entity is just an absurdity," Rothstein said. "But people don't know that, so if you let it slide and stand as a lie, then guess what? It gets attention."

Rothstein admits the situation in Israel isn't perfect. "Everyone dreams of peace, but you cannot get to peace with distortion and lies. Nothing said will come of promoting hostility," she said.

Countering the anti-Israel campaigns is expensive, and the coalitions behind the ads seem to have unlimited funds, she added. "Unfortunately, we don't. I would guess they're spending $100,000 a year on all these efforts."

While the anti-Israel posters have a four-month run in Translink stations, StandWithUs' posters will only be displayed for one month due to funding limitations, Kates said.

"We're looking for more funding to be able to keep the posters up longer, and I'd love to be contacted by donors," she said. "If we believe the coalition behind these anti-Israel posters, this is a campaign going across the country. StandWithUs wants to find supporters to be able to put up our truth in each place."

Rothstein also hopes Canadian donors will come forward.

Participants faced with unusual tasks

On the Toronto Scion City Chase website, Miller and Greenwood are described as "wily old veterans." Aged 40 and 43 respectively, they are substantially older than the mostly 20-somethings they regularly compete against – and beat.

They keep themselves in good shape by playing a variety of sports, so they're able to cover ground quickly between clue sites. More than that, they allocate their time wisely – hence the descriptor "wily."

To understand how that plays a part in a race, first you need to understand what a City Chase is.

Billed as an "urban adventure race," it sees competitors embark on a sort of scavenger hunt while deciphering cryptic clues. The clues direct them to locations, called ChasePoints, where there are tasks that must be completed. The first team to complete 10 tasks wins.

In this year's race, held in June, a clue directed participants to a "park [that] shares its name with the Danaus plexippus."

Likely not many competitors are familiar with the scientific name of butterfly species, and that's when a cellphone comes in handy. City Chase rules are liberal. You can walk, run or take public transportation to get from ChasePoint to ChasePoint, and you can call a friend for help in deciphering a clue. In their case, Miller and Greenwood rely on Neil Lipman, Miller's brother-in-law, who's "on call at home for us," Miller said.

"He'll find an address and give advice on the best way to get there," he added, in the case above, to Monarch Park.

That can save a lot of time, which in the end, is the name of the game.

Two Live Jews begin by examining all the clues, figuring out their locations, and plotting a route that will cut the time spent travelling to a minimum.

"Our strength is probably our strategy," said Miller.

When they do arrive at a ChasePoint, they're faced with unusual tasks.

At Yuk Yuks, they were asked to create a sketch and make the judges laugh.

Another task might mean learning a synchronized swim routine, completing a jigsaw puzzle (but running up and down a hill to do so), putting a snake around your neck, holding a baby alligator (its jaws were tied shut), fish in a pool or, as an alternative and to save time, eat a live earthworm.

So what motivates Two Live Jews?

"We just like that we're pushing back a little bit against father time. We compete with those kids and beat them," Greenwood said.

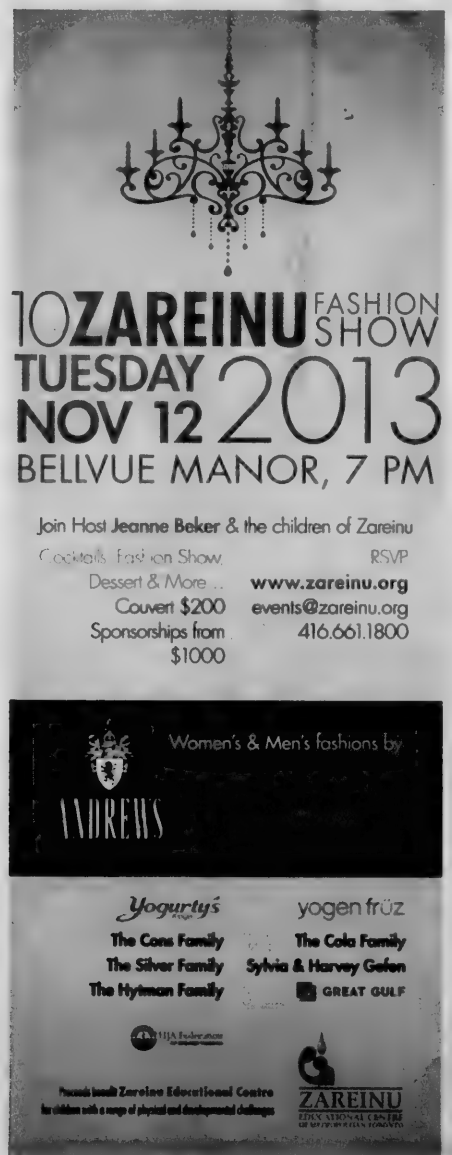
Despite the stresses the competition can put on a team, "we get along great," he added. "We're both highly competitive. We both want to win."

So what was Greenwood's most difficult task? Wearing a snake, holding an alligator?

Nope.

It was a simple golf shot, a 40-yard pitch to a target. Miller, a golfer, quickly completed his part of the task. It took Greenwood "15 to 20 shots, easy" before he did his. Trouble was, his partner had to retrieve the ball each time, making him run over and over again.

It wasn't particularly slimy or goofy, but stressful nevertheless – and followed, said Miller, with "laughter when he finally completed it."



102-year-old's birthday a day late

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

On Nov. 1, Betty Rumberg will turn 102.

With a chuckle and a twinkle in her eyes, she says, "I was really born on Oct. 31, but the midwife changed the date because she didn't think I should have my birthday on Halloween."

At Rumberg's North Toronto apartment, the articulate and attractive centenarian-plus noted that there was much humour in her family.

"My claim to fame is that my two first cousins are Moe and Curly of the Three Stooges. I love theatre and arts and I wrote and directed many plays. I guess it was in our bones."

Surrounded by piles of newspaper clippings, awards and photos, Rumberg noted the honours she received from many charitable and community organizations, where she was touted as "a fabulous volunteer."

Among her memorabilia is a plaque she received from the Bank of Montreal when she turned 100, as well as one from the Canadian Cancer Society and another from the government of Ontario for volunteerism, and many more.

She explains her varied interests. "I belong to everything that was good. It did a lot for me, and I did a lot for them."

Born in Hartford, Conn., in 1911, her family moved to St. Paul, Minn., where she received a teacher's degree at the University of Minnesota.

There she met Joseph Rumberg from Winnipeg, who was studying dentistry. When he completed his degree, they were married and moved to Winnipeg, where he became a prominent dentist and community leader.

While raising their three children, she became a volunteer, serving as president of many organizations, including Hadassah, the Dental Wives Association and the Faculty of Women's Association at the University of Manitoba. She also became involved with Congregation Shaarey Zedek.

Despite her physical problems – including macular degeneration, recurring pneumonia and living with an oxygen tank – Rumberg exudes a joie de vivre that belies her age.

Betty Rumberg

But her cheerfulness disappeared as she spoke of the death of her husband at age 67, the year after they arrived in Toronto in 1976, as well as the deaths of her siblings and two of her children, Hester, 64, a dentist and Ross, 59, the owner of Rumour's Comedy Club and Restaurant in Winnipeg.

But she adds how pleased she is that her daughter, Sue Roadburg, who teaches at Seneca College, "lives nearby and that's the reason I came here."

Shortly after moving to Toronto, she became involved with Beth Tikvah Synagogue, where she attends Shabbat and holiday services. When the synagogue had its first egalitarian service in 2012 and women were called up for aliyot, she received the first aliyah.

She serves on Beth Tikvah's chesed committee and on the tenant's association of her apartment building, and she also helps with a kosher food drive.

She credits her long life to exercise, tennis and skating, adding, "I'm still walking."

Asked what she looks forward to, she replies, "All the things that I am doing and enjoying: my family, my three grandchildren and five great-grandchildren."

Endowments up in Montreal

The Jewish Community Foundation of Montreal had about $317 million, an increase of $31 million over 2011, executive director Robert Kleinman told The CJN. He said the survey incorrectly reported a $78-million increase.

The Jewish Foundation of Manitoba's 2012 financial statement reported endowment funds worth $80 million, which contradicts the JFNA survey's finding that they were worth $57 million. The foundation's endowment funds were worth $76.5 million in 2011, according to its financial statements.

Ronit Holtzman, vice-president of planned giving and endowments with the Toronto foundation, explained in an email to The CJN that a "significant number of [the Toronto foundation's 750 individual] funds were created to support the annual United Jewish Appeal campaign. Each year, income from these funds is granted to the United Jewish Appeal campaign."

Kleinman said that although a portion of the foundations' funds goes to federations to allocate as they choose, most of the money is directed by donors to other charities, both Jewish and secular.

Ottawa's Freedman said the growth the Jewish Canadian foundations are experiencing comes from a new way of doing things.

"What we're doing is taking a donor-centric approach to fundraising, so when we're doing an 'ask' for the annual campaign, we're very often including a 'planned-giving ask' incorporated into that," Freedman said.

Freedman said efforts are being made to accommodate the needs and wishes of potential donors.

"We might look at the donor and talk about a supplementary giving opportunity, so if their particular passion is Jewish education, that's where the conversation is going to take us. I do think fundraising has changed in that it is much more about a personal relationship with the donor, and it's much more about helping them realize their philanthropic aspirations."

Kleinman said it might be the donor-centric approach "that has led to a greater appreciation by our Montreal Jewish community of the possibilities within the foundation. Most of our donors understand that we are going to take care of them, and it's not about us, it's about them."

Montreal Jewish donors might also see the foundation as "a vehicle to help with their philanthropy... We have more people over the last few years who have decided to work with us, I guess, because of our sophistication financially and tax-wise," he said.

Kleinman attributes the foundation's $31-million increase in 2012 to Montreal's "traditional, philanthropic community... We grew up with this, and we've had great leadership and great commitment and a fairly cohesive Jewish community. People feel Jewish, and they feel committed to charity."

In Toronto, Holtzman said that over the past decade, the foundation began working with outside advisers, including wealth managers, insurance professionals, lawyers, and accountants.

"We are networking closely with a larger group of advisers to connect with members of the Toronto Jewish community and talk to them about the opportunities and the benefits of opening a fund at the Jewish foundation," she said.

"The wonderful growth here... bodes well for the future."

Holtzman added that since the foundation began focusing on opening new funds and expanding its planned-giving program, the foundation's assets have grown from about $100 million in 2003 to more than $500 million in assets and planned gifts today.

Holocaust centre launches app

CJN Staff

MONTREAL — The Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre (MHMC) has launched an app for self-guided tours of its museum, in conjunction with its 16th annual Holocaust Education Series.

The mobile application for iPad and Android devices has been developed to further the MHMC's goal of educating people of all backgrounds and ages about the Holocaust, and sensitizing the public to the dangers of anti-Semitism and other forms of racism, hatred and indifference.

Julie Guinard, co-ordinator of the museum and collections, said the app provides access to three new tours through the collection's images and videos, many exclusive to the MHMC.

This year's Holocaust Education Series, which runs from Oct. 23 to Nov. 4, pays tribute to both armed and "spiritual" resistance. It recognizes those who risked their lives fighting against deportations and mass murders, as well as individuals and communities that preserved their humanity and dignity in the face of annihilation.

Burka performed for Nazi officials

To her great good fortune, the commandant of the camp, Albert Konrad Gemmeker, was a skating aficionado. When he was told there was a champion figure skater in the camp, he had her taken aside. Breaking with standard practice, he sent to Amsterdam to retrieve her skates and costumes, and he had her perform for Nazi officials on frozen ponds near the camp.

When she was not performing, she was sent to work on a farm, and later she was given a job as a housekeeper for the camp architect. She never wanted for food.

"I was saved because I was a figure skater," she said.

Ellen Burka
(Paul Lungen photo)

Burka, who still keeps busy mentoring young skaters in Toronto, was later transported to Theresienstadt, and she was there when the war ended.

After walking home to Holland, she resumed her skating career. She won the 1946 and 1947 Dutch women's championships. She also worked as a choreographer and teacher, and she organized the first-ever ice show in Holland.

Life was pretty good, yet her husband, Jan, was nervous. "He was afraid the Russians would invade Holland, and so he shlepped me to Canada."

"I came here and I thought I'd never skate again. I didn't know they had rinks here."

A newcomer to the skating community, she had to start at the bottom. As she entered the Canadian figure skating scene, she brought with her the revolutionary styles she had developed in Holland. A dancer since the age of five, she asked her students to move to the music, to express themselves. That just wasn't done at the time, she said.

Her student Toller Cranston epitomized the Burka style, skating expressively and emotionally and winning an Olympic bronze medal in 1976. With Cranston, Burka originated the idea of "theatre on ice," in which creative dance expression played a prominent role.

Altogether, she coached 26 Canadian world championship and Olympic medalists. A legend in the skating community, she has been enshrined in Canada's Sports Hall of Fame.

All the while, Burka kept her Jewish past a secret. Her daughters learned of it when they were in their late teens. It became public knowledge a few years ago when Astra made a film, Skate to Survive, about the first 44 years of her mother's life.

Representing the International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame at an event inducting Ellen and Petra Burka, Israel's consul general in Toronto, DJ Schneeweiss, described Ellen as a survivor who had enriched Canadian life.

Injecting a note of humour into the proceedings, Schneeweiss said the Jewish calendar is full of festivals that can be been summed up as, "They tried to kill us, they didn't succeed, let's eat."

In Burka's case, he said, it should be, "They tried to kill us, they didn't succeed, let's skate."

Skating not only saved Burka, it continues to be a centrepiece of her life.

TTC rejects anti-Israel ad

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The Toronto Transit Commission has rejected a proposal by the group Canadians for Justice and Peace in the Middle East (CJPME) to run an anti-Israel ad that is "inaccurate and misleading," TTC spokesperson Brad Ross said.

"There are statements in the ad with respect to illegality and international law that the TTC, in its legal opinion, believe are inaccurate and misleading and as could result in a specific group – in this case Israelis and/or Jewish people – being targeted or may lead to hatred or violence against that specific group," Ross said.

The CJPME's proposed ad is similar, but not identical, to the "Disappearing Palestine" ad that began running during the summer in Vancouver's transit system. The ad shows four maps, spanning from 1946 to 2012, that suggest Israel is taking over Palestinian land.

The pro-Israel group StandWithUs Canada posted ads in Vancouver public transit stations Oct. 14 to counter the anti-Israel ad. One emphasized shared Canadian and Israeli values, while the other depicts what it calls Jewish loss of land in the Mideast since biblical times.

Ross said that the CJPME ad submitted to the TTC did contain the four maps, "but there are some statements made [that there has been] Palestinian loss of land, and then it says this is unfair and then there is a statement that it's also illegal under international law.

"We hang our hat on this particular language, and our legal opinion is that there has been no international court finding on illegality," he added.

The decision to reject the ad was made by TTC staff, who reviewed it and determined it was unacceptable under the TTC's advertising policy and the Canadian Code of Advertising Standards.

"The advertisements that run on the TTC must comply with our policy, of course, but also adhere to all applicable laws and any guidelines that are set up by the Supreme Court of Canada," Ross said.

He said that the CJPME has the right to appeal the decision. If it chooses to do so, an advertising review working group made up of three TTC board members will determine if TTC staff applied the policy appropriately.

The CJPME did not immediately return request for comment.

Mideast media monitor launches Canadian branch

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The video of a Muslim cleric railing from the pulpit against foes of supposed Jewish origin and warning Christians in Egypt that "the fire will burn you" was not from Cairo or Tehran.

Canadians were shocked that it was surreptitiously filmed this past August in Edmonton during a Friday sermon by Egyptian-born Sheikh Shaban Sherif Mady.

That such hate-filled rhetoric was being espoused in this country would likely have never been known if such activity wasn't being constantly monitored, translated from Arabic, and disseminated to the media and posted on the Internet.

The organization behind that effort is the Middle East Media Research Institute, known as MEMRI, a Washington, D.C.-based non-governmental, non-partisan organization founded 15 years ago and headed by a former Israeli intelligence officer.

MEMRI relies entirely on private donations, and a Canadian fundraising arm has just been set up under the presidency of Marilee Wexler, who is working with a small Montreal-based board of directors. The group has been incorporated as a charitable organization for tax purposes.

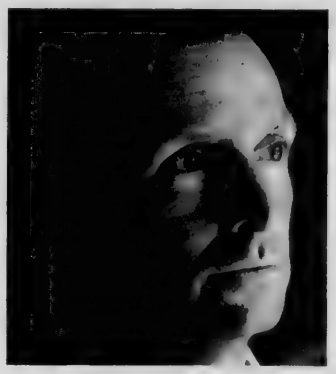
Na'amat hosts fundraiser fit for a prince

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

Prince Hermann Friedrich Fernando Roland zu Leiningen, the grandson of King Boris III of Bulgaria, who refused to evacuate 50,000 Jews from Bulgaria to concentration camps during the Holocaust, was the guest speaker at a recent Na'amat membership event.

The prince is the son of Prince Karl of Leiningen and Princess Marie Louise of Bulgaria, but prefers to be called Hermann Leiningen. Through his father, he's a great-great-great grandson of Queen Victoria of the United Kingdom and, therefore, is in the line of succession of the British throne.

The membership event was held Oct. 9 at the Borochov Cultural Centre with a filled-to-capacity crowd of more than 250 guests.



Hermann Leiningen

Event chair Roni Maderer, said Na'amat invited the prince because his grandfather's story "is a fascinating [one] that needs to be told, how one man stood up to Hitler and didn't allow himself to be bullied into submission.

"As we move further away from the Holocaust, it's more and more important to tell these stories so generations understand there were also good people who believed in humanity."

Leiningen, who lives and works in Toronto, combined his speech with humour, genealogy and centuries of history.

Speaking of his connection to royalty, he joked that his connection to royalty is that he attended Queen's University and he works in finance at the Royal Bank. He noted that he is the first royal to be a Toronto Maple Leafs fan.

He said that through his mother, his position in line to the British throne is 131, "but it is always changing with births and deaths."

His parents came to Canada in 1957 and he was born in 1963. He said he had a North American upbringing similar to most children, but he was able to spend summers in Europe with relatives who were members of royal families.

His parents chose Canada, he said, because his father was a prisoner during the war and remembered the kindness of Canadian soldiers in Bulgaria.

Leiningen complimented Na'amat on its work in improving the quality of life for women, children and families in Canada and Israel.

His father moved to Israel and spent the last 20 years of his life there. His funeral was in Israel, and he was buried in Germany.

"My father loved the beauty of Israel, and it was the kindness of the people who kept him there," Leiningen said.

What a waste

Money Matters
Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

The gall of some people knows no bounds. Even worse is the total lack of concern they display that perhaps their behaviour leaves much to be desired.

Let's start with Canada's former technology darling, a company very possibly on its way to oblivion, BlackBerry. While its leaders have followed an ancient Jewish tradition of changing the name of the "sick" in the hope that the "new" person might get better, BlackBerry is sicker than it ever was when it was known as Research in Motion. And we're not just talking about its financial situation.

Here's a company whose sales are sinking fast and whose CEO "earned" a salary of close to $19 million in fiscal 2013. Yet over the summer, his contract was, quietly, re-negotiated to one that pays up to $55 million if he loses his job due to a takeover. Of course, had the company not fallen off the cliff, nobody would be talking about a takeover. There's nothing illegal about this. It's only a moral obscenity.

A spokesperson had the gall to say that the "compensation was reviewed and approved by the entire BlackBerry board." I have no doubt that it was – adding insult to injury. Sadly, I've heard very little discussion about this, unfortunately for good reason. The list of companies that have given departing CEOs similar golden parachutes is a long one indeed.

Yet one could argue that BlackBerry is a private, albeit publicly traded, company, and no one is forced to buy its shares, so buyer beware. However such cannot be said about the taxpayer-supported Pan Am Games being held in and around Toronto in 2015. The budget for the games was set at $1.4 billion. Whether that's a good use of money is a debate worth having, and few would (or should) argue that those in favour are somehow morally wanting. But the way the budget was presented surely is.

The government recently announced, after it was basically too late to actually do anything about it, that it neglected to include the cost of the athletes village in the budget. After all, that's only a mere $710 million or so. That one can neglect to include such an amount in the official budget speaks to a total disregard for public funds and is a shameful act of deception.

Making matters worse, the same government is upset that the CEO of the Pan Am Games billed it for parking fees of 91 cents. Now that's something worthy of censure – how dare he bilk the public like that. It's just another sad example of wasting time on the petty and missing the truly important issues. What this says about a person who is making close to half a million dollars a year and stands to make hundreds of thousands of dollars more as a bonus if the games come in on budget (is that with or without the $710 million in wiggle room?), I will leave to your imagination.

The Talmud teaches that in the messianic era, chutzpah will be greatly increased. We can thus take solace that the messianic era should soon be upon us.

Jewish way with words – Pt. 2

Jewish & Digital
Mark Mietklewicz

Today more quotes by Jews, about Jews, and what Jews say to each other when they're having a bad day.

MemorableQuotations.com presents wisdom from a diverse assortment of Jewish personalities, including:

• Anne Frank: "I have often been downcast, but never in despair; I regard our hiding as a dangerous adventure, romantic and interesting at the same time."

• Lillian Hellman: "I like people who refuse to speak until they are ready to speak."

• Oscar Levant: "Strip away the phony tinsel of Hollywood and you find the real tinsel underneath."

And of course, from the Marxes.

• Groucho: "Age is not a particularly interesting subject. Anyone can get old. All you have to do is live long enough."

• Karl: "History repeats itself, first as tragedy, second as farce." [http://bit.ly/jquote7]

Jews don't have a monopoly on wit or provocative statements. I particular like the sites that feature quotes about Jews by non-Jews.

• "I will insist the Hebrews have [contributed] more to civilize men than any other nation... They are the most glorious nation that ever inhabited this Earth. The Romans and their empire were but a bubble in comparison to the Jews." – John Adams, second U.S. president.

You'll also find the famous 1899 quote from Mark Twain, which concludes, "All things are mortal but the Jew; all other forces pass, but he remains. What is the secret of his immortality?" The quote is too long to reproduce here, but if you're not familiar with it, do yourself a favour and look it up. [http://bit.ly/jquote8]

Are you a Jewish quotes maven? Then it's time to test your mettle. I came across five quizzes based on Torah (or as they put it "Old Testament") quotes. They start off pretty easy and then get challenging. Sample question: who made the following statement to God? "I am not eloquent, neither before nor since You have spoken to Your servant; but I am slow of speech and slow of tongue."

To find out, take the quiz (or check out Exodus 4:10.) [http://bit.ly/jquote9]

Finally, they may call it the "Mamaloshen" but boy can Yiddish dole it out when it comes to nasty (yet clever) quotes.

• Zalts im in di oygen, feffer im in di noz. (Throw salt in his eyes, pepper in his nose.)

• Zol es im onkumn vos ikh vintsh im - khotsh a helft, khotsh halb, khotsh a tsent kheylik. (Let what I wish on him come true – most, even half, even just 10 per cent.)

• A kleyn kind zol nokh im heysn. (A young child should be named after him.)

[http://bit.ly/jquote10]

And you've got to hand it to the members of Congregation Kehillat Israel in Lansing, Mich., who have amassed an incredible 1,171 Yiddish sayings. I'll leave you with three:

• Loif nit noch dem koved, vet er alain tsu dir kumen. (Honours will come to you by themselves if you don't run after them.)

• Nein rabonim kenen kain minyen nit machen ober tsen shusten yoh. (Nine rabbis cannot make a quorum but ten shoemakers can.)

• Du kannst nicht auf meinem rucken pishen unt mir sagen class es regen ist. (You can't pee on my back and tell me that it's rain!) [http://bit.ly/jquote11]

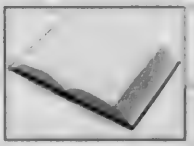
In Judaism, actions trump words

Rabbi Yirmiya Milevsky



Rabbinic Reflections

In the late afternoon of a fall day in 1929, Rabbi Eliyahu Meir Bloch arrived in a small town in Lithuania by the name of Ponevezh. His first stop was the local synagogue. As he walked in, he asked the gabbai if it would be possible for him to lead the congregation in the afternoon services and say Kaddish, since it was his mother's yahrzeit. The gabbai, being familiar with the train schedule from Rabbi Bloch's town of Telshe to Ponevezh, asked the guest: "If you have yahrzeit today, why were you travelling during the morning service? The train leaves Telshe several hours before the time of prayer."

Rabbi Bloch responded: "The Kaddish is a prayer that talks about sanctifying the name of God. Words are indeed very important and thus, the Kaddish prayer is quite significant. However, in Judaism, actions are far more important than words. Now, the purpose of my trip is to raise funds for the victims of the massacre that took place in the Land of Israel this past summer. Actions of charity that demonstrate our love and concern for our fellow Jew sanctify the name of God far more than the Kaddish prayer."

I think we can all agree that words play a major role in Jewish tradition. The length of the Saturday morning service proves it. Yet despite their significance, we can never allow words to be a substitute for actions. It's important for a parent to teach his children about ethics. Yet the greatest moment of education is when the parent acts ethically in the child's presence.

Rabbi Bloch was indeed the quintessential man of action. In the fall of 1940, he was again on the road to collect funds. This journey, however, was much longer than the one to Ponevezh: he travelled overseas to the United States. In 1941, he realized that the scheduled return to Lithuania would be impossible. As a man committed to the perpetuation of Jewish tradition and learning, he decided to open a yeshiva in Cleveland, Ohio. Over the next few years, he devoted all his time and energy to the institution, despite the fact that he had no sign of life from his wife and children who had remained in Lithuania.

In the winter of 1945, the fate of his wife and 10 out of his 11 children was confirmed. They had been massacred by the Nazis. In the midst of lecture notes that Rabbi Bloch was writing that day, we find: "Having learned of my awful tragedy, my first call of duty must be labouring in Torah. I am indentured in the service of my people... Of what importance are the woes of the individual when compared to the duties of the People of Israel?"

These weren't just words. For the next decade, until his untimely passing in 1955, Rabbi Bloch built the Telshe Yeshiva of Cleveland, an institution of higher Torah learning that produced hundreds of teachers serving the People of Israel.

So next time you hear the words of Kaddish, remember that they are indeed important. However, bear in mind that they pale in comparison to action.

Rabbi Milevsky is spiritual leader of Congregation B'nai Torah in Toronto.

Time to do more Jewish

From the Bimah
Rabbi Catharine Clark

Based on the Pew Research Center Survey of U.S. Jews released earlier this month, America's 6.6 million Jews know that 76 per cent of them attended synagogue services "a few times" or less in the past year, 32 per cent had a Christmas tree in their home last year, and 31 per cent say they're "not very attached" or "not at all attached" to Israel. The survey is a snapshot of assimilation.

With numbers like these, the American Jewish press and Jewish leaders throughout the United States went, predictably, nuts. The Forward and the Jewschool blog can't stop talking about the survey. In response to the finding that 48 per cent of American Jews think that the Israeli government isn't making a "sincere effort" to achieve peace with the Palestinians, Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League, went so far as to dismiss half of American Jewry, saying, "You know who the Jewish establishment represents? Those who care... I'm not going to follow this."

Based on the 2011 National Household Survey, we know that 329,500 Canadians self-identify as Jewish by religion and that 20,155 Canadians report that Hebrew was a language they learned at home as a child and still understood at the time of the census.

And that's all we know. There's no current national survey of the attitudes and behaviors of Canada's Jews. Federations in some of the major cities, notably Toronto and Montreal, have surveyed their local Jewish communities, but for Canada as a whole, we have only the most basic numbers about population and Hebrew-speakers.

Do we want to know more? Scholars of the Canadian Jewish community, such as Ira Robinson and Harold Waller, have long pointed out the influence of American Jewry on Canadian Jewish life and the parallel demographic trends between the two Jewish populations, albeit with a couple-of-decades time lag for the Canadian Jewish community. If they're right, our future is a much smaller, less-connected, Jewish community – unless we take action.

Conducting a survey, however, isn't the most urgent action we need to take. In her editorial response to the survey, Jane Eisner, editor of the Forward, points out that a Jew is what a Jew does.

It's time for us to "do more Jewish." If you're like the 76 per cent of American Jews who don't frequent synagogue services, it's time to show up. If you could be grouped with the 31 per cent of American Jews who aren't attached to Israel, it's time to visit, or at least have a real conversation with someone who is connected.

If you're a rabbi or synagogue lay leader, it's time to make synagogue services an experience that all Jews will want to attend. If you're a Jewish communal leader, it's time to listen to Jews who don't agree with you, even about Israel.

Demographic studies give us a good picture of the present and the past. They're predictive only if current trends continue. Let's make sure the trends identified in the survey of American Jews don't hold true for our Jewish community. And next year, let's decorate a sukkah, not a Christmas tree.

Rabbi Clark is spiritual leader of Congregation Or Shalom in London, Ont.

Peace talks have plenty of time: Abbas

JTA

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas said the new peace talks with Israel have plenty of time to bear fruit.

Abbas told the German news service Deutche Welle that the peace talks that restarted in July after a hiatus of several years have not reached a dead end, as some have claimed in recent weeks.

"We're still at the beginning of the road," he said in the interview on Saturday. "We have enough time to continue to examine the main and tough issues."

U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry has said the talks should last about nine months.

Abbas also said during his visit to Germany that any peace deal will be put up for referendum, and that Jerusalem should be the shared capital of both the Jewish and the Palestinian states. He also hinted that the negotiations are based on the pre-1967 borders.

Mahmoud Abbas

Also Saturday, the Hamas prime minister in Gaza, Ismail Haniyeh, called for an end to the division between the Palestinian leaderships in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip in order to better negotiate an agreement with Israel.

"Let's have one government, one parliament and one president," Haniyeh said, according to Reuters.

He also called for a national strategy that includes "armed struggle, popular uprising and political, diplomatic and media battles."

Bank of Israel to get first female boss

JTA

JERUSALEM — Karnit Flug, deputy governor of the Bank of Israel, was picked to move up to the top spot and if confirmed will be the first woman to be the central bank's governor.

Her appointment was announced Sunday by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Finance Minister Yair Lapid. The deputy governor since July 2011, Flug has been acting governor since Stanley Fischer stepped down June 30. Fischer recommended Flug as his replacement.

Her appointment came after two would-be appointees withdrew their names after embarrassing personal information came to light.

Lawrence Summers, a former U.S. Treasury secretary and president of Harvard University, also reportedly turned down the post last week.

Flug had resigned after being passed over to replace Fischer. Her nomination must be confirmed by the Knesset.

Flug earned a PhD in economics from Columbia University in 1985 and worked at the International Monetary Fund before joining the Bank of Israel in 1998.

Karnit Flug

She joins Janet Yellen of the United States as landmark picks to lead the central banks of their countries. Yellen, who is Jewish, was appointed this month as chief of the Federal Reserve and if confirmed would be its first female chief.

Iran offers 'no serious proposals'

The Times of Israel

Iran made "no serious proposals" during the two days of talks on its nuclear program in Geneva this week, senior U.S. officials reportedly told their Israeli counterparts.

The officials said the talks were "exploratory" rather than substantive, Israel's Channel 2 news reported Friday night.

Bloomberg to receive first 'Jewish Nobel'

JTA

NEW YORK — New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg will be the first recipient of the $1-million Genesis Prize, which is being called the "Jewish Nobel Prize."

The award was announced Monday.

The Genesis Prize Foundation was established in 2012 by the Genesis Philanthropy Group, a consortium of mega-wealthy philanthropist-businessmen from the former Soviet Union including Mikhail M. Fridman, Pyotr Aven and German Khan; the office of the Prime Minister of Israel, and the Jewish Agency for Israel.

The prize, which will be given out annually, is awarded to an accomplished, internationally renowned professional from anywhere in the world who is a role model in his or her community and who can inspire the younger generation of Jews worldwide, according to the foundation's website.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu will present the prize to Bloomberg at a ceremony in Jerusalem in May.

Bloomberg was chosen from more than 200 nominees worldwide because of his "track record of outstanding public service and his role as one of the world's greatest philanthropists," according to the prize committee.

"Many years ago, my parents instilled in me Jewish values and ethics that I have carried with me throughout my life, and which have guided every aspect of my work in business, government, and philanthropy," Bloomberg said in a statement, in which he said he was honoured to receive the prize.

Israeli minister in Ottawa for talks on Iran

CJN Staff

Israel's Minister of Strategic Affairs was in Ottawa earlier this week to enlist Canada's support in persuading the world to keep up pressure on Iran to end its pursuit of nuclear weapons.

Yuval Steinitz was expected to meet with Prime Minister Stephen Harper and Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird on Monday as The CJN went to press.

In an interview with the Globe and Mail published Oct. 20, Steinitz said it would be unwise to ease the pressure on Iran.

"Canada is very influential and can exercise its influence elsewhere – in Europe, in China, in America, in Russia, and elsewhere. It's very important. And I know that the Canadian government is already doing so," he told the newspaper.

Steinitz was expected to fly to Washington Tuesday to be briefed regarding the West's negotiations with Iran.

Yad Vashem honour rejected

JTA

JERUSALEM — A family member of an Egyptian doctor who was the first Arab to be recognized by Yad Vashem as Righteous Among the Nations said the family is not interested in the honour.

Mohamed Helmy, who died in 1982, was recognized by the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in a ceremony last month.

The Associated Press tracked down one of Helmy's relatives in Cairo, who told the news service that the family would not accept the award.

"If any other country offered to honour Helmy, we would have been happy with it," Mervat Hassan, the wife of Helmy's great-nephew, told AP.

Hassan said the family did not want to accept the honour because Israel and Egypt continue to have a hostile relationship despite a 30-year peace treaty.

She added, however, "I respect Judaism as a religion and I respect Jews. Islam recognizes Judaism as a heavenly religion."

Helmy settled in Berlin after completing his medical studies there, but was forbidden to work under the Nazi regime beginning in 1938 because he was not considered Aryan. He spoke out against Nazi policies and hid a Jewish friend at a cabin he owned. Helmy arranged to hide other members of her family at the home of a German woman who was also honoured by Yad Vashem, Frieda Szturmann, according to Yad Vashem. Letters written decades ago by the Jewish Holocaust survivors on behalf of Helmy were discovered in the archives of the Berlin Senate and recently submitted to Yad Vashem.

European Jews often fear showing identity: poll

JTA

KIEV — A quarter of respondents in a survey of Jews from nine European countries said they avoid visiting places and wearing symbols that identify them as Jews for fear of anti-Semitism.

Fear of wearing a kippah and other identifiably Jewish items was especially strong in Sweden, where 49 per cent of 800 respondents said they refrained from such actions, according to the yearlong survey conducted among more than 5,100 Jews by the European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights.

In France, 40 per cent of approximately 1,200 Jews said they avoided wearing such items in public, followed by Belgium with 36 per cent, according to preliminary results from the survey obtained by JTA.

In total, 22 per cent of respondents said they avoided "Jewish events or sites" because of safety concerns.

"The results show that a majority of European Jews are experiencing a rise in anti-Semitism," Gert Weisskirchen, a former representative of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe for fighting anti-Semitism, said Oct. 15 at a conference in Kiev.

The survey, which began on Sept. 3, 2012 closed last month. Along with Sweden, France and Belgium, the survey was conducted online in Britain, Belgium, Germany, Italy, Hungary, Romania and Latvia. The full report is due to be published next month in Vilnius.

In Hungary, 91 per cent of more than 500 respondents said anti-Semitism has increased in the past five years. The figure was 80 per cent or higher in France, Belgium and Sweden. In Germany, Italy and Britain, some 60 per cent of respondents identified a growth in anti-Semitism, compared to 39 per cent in Latvia.

Figures for people who said they had experienced an anti-Semitic incident in the 12 previous months were 30 per cent for Hungary, 21 per cent for France and 16 per cent in Germany.

Twenty-seven per cent of respondents said the perpetrators were Muslims, while 22 per cent blamed people with "left-wing views" and 19 per cent said the people responsible had "right-wing views."

More than 75 per cent of respondents said they don't report anti-Semitic harassment to police and 64 per cent said they don't report physical assaults, with 67 per cent saying that reporting incidents was either "not worth the effort" or otherwise ineffectual.

"Individual states need to address anti-Semitism not for the sake of the current generation, but to prevent the worsening of the situation for the following one," said Oleksandr Feldman, the Ukrainian Jewish parliament member who organized the two-day conference, titled "From the Beilis Trial to Berlin and Beyond" on the 100th anniversary of the anti-Semitic blood libel trial against Menachem Mendel Beilis, who was acquitted of killing a Christian child to use his blood for rituals.

HIKERS HELP: Some 50 Canadians and more than 30 Israeli victims of terror gathered in Jerusalem recently for the sixth annual OneFamily Cross Israel Hike, a challenging five-day trek to raise money and awareness for Israeli victims of terror. OneFamily (www.onefamilytogether.org) is Israel's only national organization solely dedicated to the rehabilitation of victims of terror attacks and their families. It established the hike as a way for Canadians to show solidarity with terror victims. "For its symbolism alone, hiking is a perfect way to show our solidarity. When we hike, we move toward our goal one step at a time. By supporting victims of terror, we help them heal one step at a time, one family at a time," said Pam Albert, director of OneFamily Canada and a six-time event participant.

Jews and Muslims slam anti-ritual slaughter ads

JTA

ANTWERP, Belgium — A Belgian radio ad that's accused of drawing on Holocaust themes to promote a ban on ritual slaughter has drawn sharp criticism from Jewish and Muslim representatives.

The ad, which the Antwerp-based animal welfare group Gaia produced for airing on national radio and sent Oct. 14 via email to 200 politicians, delivers a mock testimony told from the perspective of a lamb waiting for the slaughter.

"We were asleep when they came for us," the voice-over for the lamb says. "I couldn't understand a word of their foreign language. They hurled us in the truck and took us to a building with blood on the floor. I know what will happen to me but I can only wait."

An announcer then says: "Without stunning, animals are very aware of what goes on in the slaughterhouse. Politicians, change the law and forbid ritual slaughter."

Jewish and Muslim religious laws require animals to be conscious at the time of their slaughter – a practice that some animal rights activists deem cruel.

In a strongly worded condemnation of the ad, Nicolas Zomersztajn of Brussels' Jewish Secular Community Center told the Belgian news agency Belga that the ad was "a new example of the trivialization of the crime of genocide by Gaia activists."

The Executive Committee of Belgian Muslims said the campaign "bordered on racism."

A Gaia spokesperson denied the ad contained references to the Holocaust.

"This is an attempt to describe what animals experience now without any religious or historic connotations," the spokesperson told JTA last week. Asked about the "foreign language" element, she replied: "Yes, animals don't understand people."

In 2005, the PETA animal rights group apologized to the Jewish community for its "Holocaust on Your Plate" campaign, two years after the Anti-Defamation League termed it "a project for trivializing the murder of six million Jews."

Low-dose radiation can be beneficial, scientist says

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

Nuclear engineer Jerry Cuttler wants to debunk the radiation scare.

"Low-dose radiation could be employed to delay the onset of Alzheimer's and Parkinson's diseases," said Cuttler, who has more than 50 years of experience in nuclear research.

"Low radiation causes a net beneficial health effect," he said. "Research indicates that the beneficial effects caused by low radiation far outweigh the damage."

Cuttler, 71, received a career achievement award from the International Dose Response Society and was recently the guest speaker at the Institution of Mechanical Engineers.

He is a graduate of the University of Toronto in nuclear engineering physics, and received a doctorate in nuclear sciences from Technion– Israel Institute of Technology in Haifa.

He led a team at Atomic Energy of Canada Limited that designed and procured the instrumentation for reactor control, safety systems and radiation measurement for three CANDU plants, in Quebec, New Brunswick and Argentina, and then for the Pickering B and Bruce B stations (four reactors each) in Ontario.

Since 1995, Cuttler has been assessing the health effects of radiation and drawing international attention to the beneficial effects of low radiation, since high radiation is known to be harmful.

Jerry Cuttler

"People ask me, 'Since radiation damages cells, how can it be beneficial?' The answer is that low radiation damage 'turns on' many genes that boost powerful, adaptive protection systems that prevent, repair and remove or replace naturally occurring damage in cells, tissues and organisms... So the net benefit is very important."

Low exposures are protection systems in our bodies, curing infections, extending life and reducing the incidences of cancer and congenital malformations, he said in an interview.

"I have urged many oncologists to use total body low-dose radiation as part of cancer therapy."

After retiring in 2000, he formed Cuttler & Associates and served as president of the Canadian Nuclear Society. He was appointed a CNS fellow in June 2000.

Cuttler provides engineering services to the Bruce Power for the restart of Bruce reactors 1 and 2 after 10 years, to Ontario Power Generation for service to Pickering B for extending its life, and to other nuclear stations, as well as doing upgrades to make sure the stations meet the current standards and requirements.

Cuttler lectures extensively and has published numerous research papers and articles for peer review journals.

In a paper about the Fukushima nuclear accident, Cuttler noted the misunderstood effects of radiation. He hopes to change people's attitudes to radiation.

Educational programs to communicate the biology of how radiation affects living organisms in beneficial ways, he noted, would improve social acceptance, allowing the use of nuclear energy for many very important peaceful applications.

Low radiation, he added, allows medical practitioners to carry out X-rays, CT-scans and other tests without fear of cancer. As an example, he said, X-rays have been used for more than 100 years with positive health effects.

"It would also open the path to clinical studies for the use of low radiation to treat or prevent very important illnesses, especially for senior citizens."

For more information visit Jerry Cuttler's web page or call 416-837-8865.

OBITUARIES and Related Notices

Louis Strauss ז"ל

June 10, 1924 to October 8, 2013

Louis Strauss was born in Budapest, Hungary. He was internationally known as a character actor, comedian, mime artist and director. Louis performed in numerous night club engagements that took him from Budapest to Vienna, New York, Florida, Montreal and Toronto. He performed in several leading and supporting roles on Television. He also established the Accents comedy group, specializing in cabaret type shows. His final curtain call came in the early morning of October 8, 2013. He would want to be remembered for his love of theater and his ability to make people laugh. He leaves behind his beloved and devoted wife, Susan. Company helps advertisers get online presence

Jenny Libman
Special to The CJN

Robyn Beder, founder of Net Margins Inc., a company that provides advertisers with cost effective access to high quality media inventory on the web, was destined for a career in mass communications.

"I studied it in school, before people even had access to the Internet," laughed Beder. "Of course things were a little bit different back then, and I never could have predicted where my career would take me."

After graduating from university, Beder earned a certificate in public relations from Humber College and was able to use her networking skills to turn her part-time position as a sales associate at Roots into a job in their public relations department.

"My official role was to help plan events for the company, but what I was really doing was selling stories to the press," she said.

"I realized I was actually very good at sales, and was bitten by the bug."

Beder left Roots and went to work for a company that sold advertisements for small-town newspapers.

Eventually, in 1995, she left print media and began a new role at a company that sold websites.

"This was a new technology and it made me a little nervous," said Beder.

"It was my mother who convinced me that websites were the way of the future and I should take the risk."

Of course, Beder's mother was right. The Internet became accessible to the mainstream public, and her company was purchased by Microsoft.

"All of a sudden not only were we selling websites, but other companies wanted to sell ads for the websites. This was a very cool time to be working in technology."

In 2003, Beder combined the skills she had developed over the years and created Net Margins Inc. In 2009 she left her job to focus on building her own company full time.

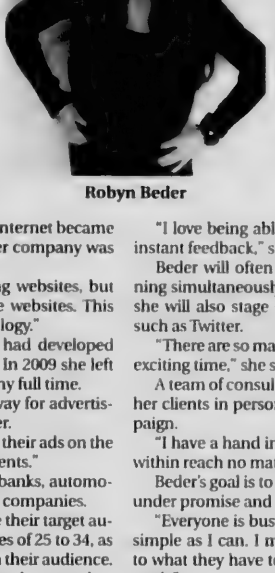
"Net Margins [provides] a cost effective way for advertisers to get into online media," explained Beder.

"We build relationships to help clients get their ads on the web, and make sure these ads get seen by clients."

Beder has a long list of clients, including banks, automotive industries, retailers and packaged goods companies.

"A company will approach me and tell me their target audience, for example mothers between the ages of 25 to 34, as well as the time of day that they want to reach their audience.

"I will then find content on the Internet that matches their ads," explained Beder.



Robyn Beder

The client will design their advertisement and Beder will match the content to the websites.

One example is when she ran an Air Canada ad for a flight to Tel Aviv in The Canadian Jewish News.

After the ad is placed, Beder will track how effective it is by monitoring things such as how many links a consumer clicked through on the website, or how many people signed up for a product.

"We can see right away if an ad is working, and if it's not I'll make suggestions to improve it," she said.

Beder is constantly monitoring campaign reports to ensure that they are reaching the largest audience possible.

"I love being able to see the progress right away; it's like instant feedback," she said.

Beder will often have more than 50 ad campaigns running simultaneously. In addition to placing ads on websites she will also stage campaigns on other social media sites, such as Twitter.

"There are so many avenues to explore today – it's such an exciting time," she said.

A team of consultants works with Beder, but she meets all her clients in person and she oversees all aspects of a campaign.

"I have a hand in every project, and my iPhone is always within reach no matter what time it is," she said.

Beder's goal is to say "yes" to whatever her clients want. "I under promise and over deliver," she said.

"Everyone is busy, so I want to make working with me as simple as I can. I make everyone feel important and listen to what they have to say. I will always find a way to make it work."

Facebook nabs Israeli start-up Onavo

David Shamah
The Times of Israel

After losing out on acquiring Waze, Facebook has nabbed another Israeli start-up, Onavo, paying between $100 million and $200 million U.S.

Onavo – which has 40 employees worldwide, 30 of them in Israel – will remain in Israel, with Onavo becoming Facebook's first Israeli research and development centre.

Using Onavo's megabyte-thrifty apps, Facebook will be able to pursue its goal of expanding web connectivity in the developing world.

Established in 2010, Onavo allowed users to save money on their mobile devices' data plans. Before the popularization of unlimited data plans, users were charged a hefty amount if they surpassed the maximum amount of bandwidth they had paid for.

Onavo offered free software to compress the bits and bytes being uploaded and downloaded via the cell network. Similar to the compression offered by applications that download programs, music and video to desktop computers, Onavo applied its patented compression technology to videos and other byte-hogging data, and also showed users exactly how much data – and money – they saved using Onavo with apps such as Facebook, Instagram and YouTube.

Onavo Extend, the app released to the iPhone App Store in 2011 and Google Play in 2012, "compresses your data so that you can do more with your mobile device on even the tightest data plan," Onavo said at the time.

Onavo was a top download in the App Store when it was released and won numerous awards. It was even involved in a mini-scandal when it claimed the App Store itself was a major drain on user's data plans. The company found that the iTunes App Store account was "responsible for more than 13 per cent of all iPhone data usage across America. Three-quarters of that data comes from downloads, while 24 per cent comes from search."

By 2012, though, all-in-one plans – which provided a very substantial amount of data – became popular. Although hundreds of thousands of users who had not upgraded their plans could still benefit from Onavo, the app became less relevant.

But with the Facebook purchase, Onavo gets a new lease on life, providing its technology to hundreds of millions, perhaps billions, of people in the developing world that Facebook would like to help connect to the Internet – and turn into Facebook users.

Many cellphone owners in such places as India and Africa pay high prices for Internet access, due to poor connectivity in their areas. With Onavo, Facebook will be able to offer users to keep costs down by compressing data to enable them to get more out of their data plans.

According to many sources, one of the main reasons Facebook lost out on buying Waze was its insistence on moving the company's operations to existing Facebook facilities. Does the Onavo announcement represent a lesson learned by Facebook? Company officials wouldn't say, but industry observers in Israel said it did.

"Everybody in Silicon Valley has an Israeli office or R&D facility," said one observer. "Sooner or later, Facebook was going to have to open one, too. It would look strange if they didn't. The Onavo purchase is a good opportunity for them to do so."

Canada at War: A Graphic History of World War Two

Paul Keery.
Illustrated by Michael Wyatt.
Douglas & McIntyre.

In the obituaries that followed Alex Colville's recent death, many cited his experience as a 25-year-old war artist, riding through Germany in the spring of 1945 with the Third Canadian Infantry Division.

At Bergen Belsen, which was liberated by the British, Colville encountered emaciated survivors, including some who died in front of him, and heaps of the dead. He did sketches and watercolours, which, in the mode of other war artists hired by the Canadian government, he worked up as oil paintings when he returned home. Some of these are viewable on the website of the Ottawa War Museum, but these paintings aren't generally on display at the museum itself. On the museum's website, you can view a reproduction of the remarkable painting Bodies in a Grave, Belsen, in which many of the motifs of Holocaust imagery of later film and literature receive their first masterly presentation. Colville was among the first artists to address Holocaust atrocities.

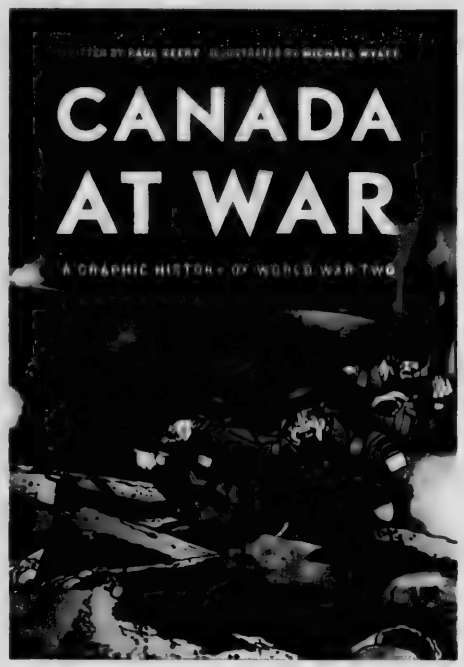
War, as part of Canadian history, has played an increasing role in efforts by the present Canadian government to fund memorialization. Government-funded programs have focused on the War of 1812 as well as the Battle of the Plains of Abraham, asserting the contemporary urge to do something more with events that helped define Canadian identity.

Canada at War: A Graphic History of World War Two is a contribution to this effort. Graphic presentations of difficult subject matter – one thinks always in this context of Art Spiegelman's breakthrough, Maus – have become common in popular and educational markets. Although they're aimed, first, at young adults, most adults find things to admire in them. Canada at War is lavish, large format, reliant far more on the punch of its images than on the detail or stylishness of its text. Here it differs from Maus, which Spiegelman chose to present in black and white, and which tells its story in rich novelistic language through the presentation of colourful characters.

Canada at War presents no characters. There are familiar faces – those of Mackenzie King and Hitler – but these are background figures to the larger patterns of moving fronts, key battles, setbacks and victories. Organized around major contributions by the Canadian armed forces, Canada at War outlines disasters at Hong Kong and Dieppe, the Allied advance through Italy, Canadian successes in Germany and Holland, and, finally, the short-lived Canadian involvement in the Pacific. The reader learns how a weak, underfunded Armed Forces was massively increased in size and trained in drastic new challenges in order to aid in the defeat of Germany.

Some undertakings ordered by the Allied leaders are put in a critical light, including the high-casualty advance through Italy, whose military usefulness remains a point of contention. But Canada at War avoids any number of difficult issues, including the Canadian government's inaction in response to the German-created refugee disaster in Europe, the impact of French Quebec on King's attitudes toward conscription and the internment of Montreal Mayor Camillien Houde for sedition based on his support for Mussolini's Italy as a Roman Catholic country. Rather, Canada at War highlights Quebec-based detachments fighting in Europe – and so it should, but alongside more troubling issues.

The need for war heroes appeared as soon as the war was on. Comic books were popular reading material among the forces, and back home, the Canadian Jewish Congress saw them as a medium well matched to the events in Europe. Prepared in 1944, comics under the title Jewish War Heroes told the stories of Col. David Arnold Croll, later the mayor of Windsor; Lou Warren Somers, who flew in the Halifax-based Lion Squadron, and Max Abramson, a native of Calgary, who, aboard the HMCS Prince Robert, was involved in the capture of a German armed merchant ship.



Drawn with a heavy black line, the CJC comics go for an action-packed, heroic look, not unlike that of Canada at War, though the latter has a penchant for high-colour images of artillery barrage as it rips through machinery and men. Canada at War zeroes in on heroes – winners of the Distinguished Service Order and leaders with visionary plans – much like the CJC's choice of subjects.

The Congress comics were designed for schoolchildren to provide an education on developments in Europe and to lend an upbeat note to the dark events sweeping in on the radio and in newsreels. Canada at War is likely headed for history classrooms, where its focus on explosive battles, effective hardware and improved training will go over well. Its imagery is ripely dramatic for the video game generation.

At the War Museum in Ottawa, Colville's postwar paintings present themselves as remarkable and wholly unheroic alternatives to the punch of the graphic story-telling in Canada at War.

Colville was always modest and matter of fact in his accounts of his encounter with Belsen. "For me, it was work," he said. "If you're a writer or a painter, your material is life as you see it being lived and that's it. You get to work and do it."

Norman Ravvin is at work on a collaborative book, The Wordless Leonard Cohen Songbook, with Toronto book artist and wood engraver George A. Walker.

Vineyards revive ancient Negev wine route

Abigail Klein Leichman
Israel 21c

Hannah and Eyal Izrael founded Carmey Avdat, one of nine Israeli vineyards established along the path of the old wine and spice routes in the Negev Desert highlands. These farms have brought back to life ancient grape-growing terraces from a forgotten civilization.

"During our travels through the Negev, we came upon a hidden riverbed with remains of an ancient farm and vineyard. We instantly fell in love with the place and decided that we would establish our farm at the site, which had been a vineyard during the Nabatean period more than 2,000 years ago. We established the Carmey Avdat Farm there in 1998," Eyal Izrael says.

They and eight other families were able to realize their dream of cultivating grapes and bottling wine with the help of the Wine Route Project of the Ramat Hanegev Regional Council, which provides the land and access to agricultural expertise.

Mother Nature helps, too: wine grapes thrive on the winter flash floods in the Negev mountains, as well as on the winter cold and summer dry heat.

"In ancient times, there were farms growing grapes for the wine industry in the city of Avdat, and there they found the remains of a winery and cellar," Izrael told ISRAEL21c.

"They'd harvest grapes in the nearby vineyard, put them on the backs of camels and bring them to Avdat, where they would stomp the grapes and store the juice in clay jars in big cellars underground to keep out the heat. They exported some to Europe and some to Petra, so this was actually a known wine region."

The Izraels used to work for the Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel. After deciding to start a farm where they could also grow fruit and host guests in cabins they built, Eyal learned the art of winemaking at Ben Shoshan Winery on Kibbutz Bror Chayil and at the Soreq Winery in Tal Shachar. They began with Cabernet Sauvignon and Merlot grapes, harvested by hand.

"We are producing 6,000 bottles a year," Izrael said. "We have also planted some Chardonnay, Petit Bordeaux, Vilana and Barbera grapes, and will start producing white wines this year for the first time."

The Negev vintners meet periodically to share ideas about making a living off the land. In addition to Carmey Avdat, the wineries in the area include Kadesh Barnea, Ashba, Rota, Sde Boker, Nana, Sdema, Rujum and Derech Erez. Visitors can tour and sample the wines individually, or all in one wine cellar at Boker Valley Vineyards Farm, run by Merlot grower Moshe Zohar.

The Kadesh Barnea Winery, the largest in Ramat Hanegev, produces more than 80,000 bottles annually under the management of founder Alon Tzadok, and his wife, Nira. Their son Gilad handles sales and marketing, while their other son, Yogev, and his wife, Eden, are the winemakers. The couple studied winemaking in Florence, Italy.

The greening of the Negev.

Gilad Tzadok explains that Kadesh Barnea was established in 1997 at Moshav Kadesh Barnea, a bit west of the wine route. "My father wanted to see how the grapes would adjust to the desert heat. He produced 1,000 bottles and everybody liked it."

For a few years, Alon Tzadok sold much of his crop to Barkan Wine Cellars, the second-largest winery in Israel, but beginning in 2003, the business stayed on the farm. At that point, Kadesh Barnea became kosher (meaning that the entire process is handled by religious Jewish employees) because kosher wines find a larger domestic and international market.

They press their own grapes and others from area farms, producing varietals including Petit Verdot, Shiraz, Cabernet Sauvignon, Cabernet Franc, Mourvèdre, Sauvignon Blanc and Chardonnay. "All the grapes are from the desert because that's what we believe in," Alon Tzadok said.

The wines are sold in the United States, and exports will probably be expanded to France and England.

This year, Kadesh Barnea planted five acres of wine grapes at Desert Shanti House Youth Village, a therapeutic refuge in Ramat Hanegev for teenage runaways. The youth village will receive all the profits from the sale of the grapes.

Zvi Remak was born and raised in the San Francisco Bay Area, earned a degree in agronomy from California State Polytechnic University, and moved to Israel's Kibbutz Sde Boker – the retirement home of the first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion – in 1980. For 13 years, he tended the fruit orchards.

Making wine in the Negev

"Sde Boker was based on agriculture for many years, but in the early 1990s, the price of fruit had really dropped and there was an idea to try growing wine grapes in the brackish water we have in the area," Remak told ISRAEL21c.

"That gave me the idea of making wine, mainly because I've seen that the people who make the money are those who sell the final product. I wanted my four daughters to meet my family in California anyway, and it worked out to be the right time for a sabbatical. We lived in Napa Valley for a year, and I studied winemaking at a local college."

The first bottles from Sde Boker Winery were produced in 2000. Today the kibbutz grows Cabernet Sauvignon, Merlot and Zinfandel grapes.

"The brackish water experiment did not work, so we use freshwater," Remak said. At the region's agricultural R&D centre, agronomists continue attempting to find a way to use the abundant and less expensive salty water for wine grapes, in co-operation with the nine area growers.

Remak remains the winemaker and is in charge of the vineyard. He does not work in the winery itself, which became kosher in 2011.

"We make a few thousand bottles a year," he said. "I realized I wasn't the first person to make wine in the area, and that was exciting, though it was difficult to start something new on a kibbutz, especially when the wine industry was less developed. Every place has its own qualities, and that's what makes wine interesting."

Toronto-based musician challenges listeners

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Multi-award winning singer/songwriter Noah Zacharin began playing guitar at nine, penned his first song at 13, and has been performing since he was 14.

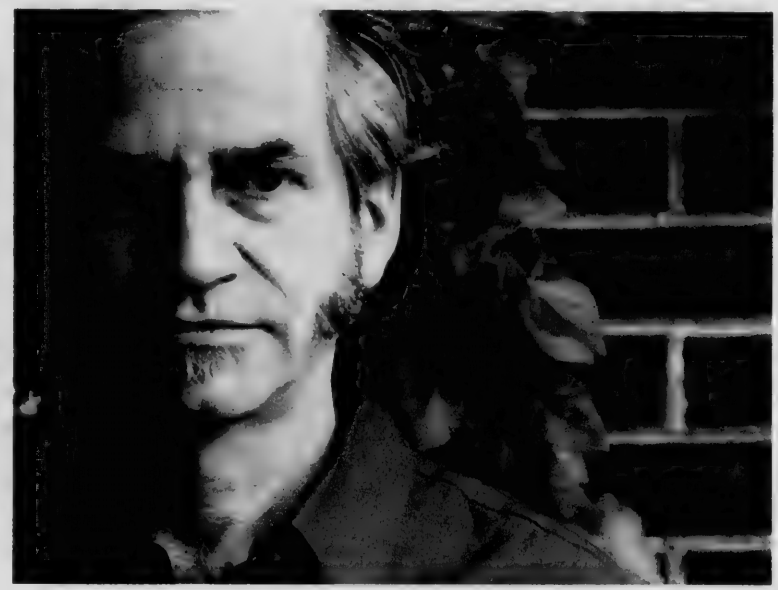
Zacharin's guitar stylings, singing and songwriting have garnered praise from both fans and music critics. He performs regularly in Toronto, including on the first Thursday of the month at The Winchester, the last Wednesday of the month at the Emmet Ray, and semi-regularly at The Local.

His last solo CD, his sixth, Waiting on Your Love, garnered critical success. He's currently working with musician Douglas September on his next album, so far untitled, due out in the spring of 2014. It will feature songs he wrote a number of years ago.

September is known for recording electronic sounds, which Zacharin said are wackier than most things he has recorded previously, except for one record he produced at home with a lot of ambient noises.

"I liked him and wanted to work with him and see what would happen," said Zacharin, who was born in Montreal but now lives in Toronto. "Originally, we were going to do just an EP with three or four tracks, but now it looks like we will have nine. This will have a band and will include newer songs, and songs I wrote a decade ago that just never got released."

Zacharin comfortably jumps from one musical genre to another including blues, jazz, folk, country, bluegrass and pop. Although it may confuse some listeners, he said it makes what he does less identifiable and a little more challenging for those coming to hear his music, especially his live shows. He tries to create a flow from one song to another, although he admits he's not above jarring his audiences from time to time.



Noah Zacharin has released his sixth solo CD Waiting on Your Love

"When I try to bring all the genres together, I think I can do it because it's still me singing it," Zacharin said. "I have always loved all music, I was never focused on any one style of music to the exclusion of others. Although, I probably came to pop music later in my life...sometime in my 20s, I was playing with people, and I needed to have a bigger repertoire, so I started to listen to music I hadn't listened to before.

"The guitar is a magnificent instrument of expression in all those genres. So I do my best to understand the instrument, [to] go where it wants to go."

Zacharin hopes that after listening to his music, people will have gone on a little journey and enjoyed the journey quite a lot.

"My lyrics are what are most directly influenced by my life as a Jew," he said. "I think about God and His creations – human and animal, vegetable and mineral – and the place we all have, relative to each other. With the words, I try to sort all that out in poems and songs.

"Musically, the influence hasn't been so much on me as an instrumentalist or writer of melody. But as a vocalist, my extensive on-the-job experience leading prayers at the Anshe Minsk Synagogue in Kensington Market has been of great influence.

"Over the past decade, I have learned to sing out, to feel what singing is, to reach for some truth when I do it, to trust that the line of melody will carry what it is. I need to express, whether light or dark. I have also become more grateful to be able to sing. As my mother, bless her heart, once said: 'The more I meet people who speak, the more I love people who sing.'"

As a guitarist, Zacharin has recorded and performed with Penny Lang, Steve Payne, Danny Marks, Bruce Murdoch, Lucien Francoeur and Rick Fielding, to name a few. In addition to performing and recording with them, he has also collaborated on songwriting with Laura Fernandez and Jeff Barnes.

Last February in Montreal, Jason Levy filmed Zacharin's performance at the Upstairs Jazz Bar & Grill – the DVD will be released later this year. Also to be released soon is a collection of songs recorded years ago at his home that he recently unearthed.

Zacharin has hosted both radio and live shows, and he's a published poet. He is currently working on a number of children's books. Some of his poems were translated into Hebrew by Israeli poet Moshe Dor, and were subsequently published in major newspapers in Israel.

Author of interfaith love story remembered

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The author of what has been called a lost Canadian classic, a novel about the then-taboo subject of a Christian-Jewish romance, is finally getting some recognition in her adopted city.

Tribute was paid to Gwethalyn Graham, who won the Governor General's Award for Earth and High Heaven, published in 1944, when the Montreal Writers' Chapel Trust unveiled a commemorative plaque in the Anglican Church of St. James the Apostle on Ste. Catherine Street in the heart of downtown.

The guest speakers were Norman Ravvin, chair of Concordia University's Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies, and Montreal writer Claire Holden Rothman, whose best-selling novel The Heart Specialist, was long-listed for the Scotiabank Giller Prize in 2009.

They spoke of how courageously and sensitively Graham tackled the prejudices of her time (and her own milieu) with regard to Jews, as well as French-Canadians.

They lamented, as does the Writers' Chapel Trust, that Graham and her provocative book are all but forgotten.

Earth and High Heaven certainly did not go unnoticed in its day. Besides the Governor General's prize, it was the first Canadian novel to reach no. 1 on the New York Times bestseller list, where it remained for 37 weeks. It sold over a million copies, was translated into 18 languages, and was almost made into a Hollywood movie.

Mogul Samuel Goldwyn paid the then-astronomical sum of $100,000 for the rights and Katherine Hepburn was picked to play the female lead, but the film was never made.

The novel also won the Anisfeld-Wolf Book Award in 1945, which was established to recognize books that expose racism or celebrate cultural diversity.

Graham died prematurely at age 52 in 1965, having never published another novel.

Graham knew of the world she wrote.

Born into a well-to-do Protestant family in Toronto, she moved to Montreal in 1934

Gwethalyn Graham

and lived in Westmount, where Earth and High Heaven is set during the first three years of World War II.

It unflinchingly describes the genteel anti-Semitism that comes to the surface when the fictional Erika Drake, daughter of a prominent Westmount family, falls in love with the Jewish Marc Reiser from northern Ontario.

This was a time when Jews and gentiles rarely mixed in society, let alone wed. For the Drakes, Reiser was objectionable both for his religion and his humbler origins. Love triumphed, but not without its price for a headstrong young woman.

There was resistance on the other side, too: Reiser's folks were not happy about the union either.

Graham, an early feminist, bore some of the character traits of her protagonist. She defied the conventions of her day. She deplored anti-Semitism, not only in fiction, but also in her journalism, and she spoke out for the admission of Jewish refugees.

Her first novel, Swiss Sonata, which, in 1938, also won a Governor General's Award, was set at a girls' finishing school in Switzerland on the eve of World War II (Graham attended such a place). It portrays the horrors of the Nazi rise to power, including the worsening persecution of Jews.

According to the Writers' Chapel Trust, Earth and High Heaven, not only "captured the hearts and minds of its generation," it "helped shape the more diverse and inclusive culture we have today."

Ravvin said the novel's popularity is all the more remarkable because non-Jews rarely read about Jews at that time, let alone stories that ran so counter to prevailing attitudes. Montreal's anglo elite of that era was not used to such an unflattering mirror being held up to them – especially by one of their own.

Graham herself said of the book that it was "a plea for the individual, that he or she may be regarded and respected as such, and not be judged arbitrarily according to a category."

The plaque, unveiled on the 100th anniversary of her birth, places Graham alongside previous late Montreal-based authors honoured: John Glassco, A.J.M. Smith, F.R. Scott and Hugh MacLennan.

In 2004, Earth and High Heaven and Swiss Sonata were reprinted by Cormorant Books of Toronto, and there has been renewed scholarly interest in Graham.

Holden Rothman admitted she had never heard of the book until she was asked to review the re-issue. Describing herself as the daughter of a Protestant mother and a Jewish father, who grew up in Westmount, albeit in a much later period, she found Earth and High Heaven resonated with her.

Gala concert celebrates 150 years of Toronto cantorate

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

The Toronto Council of Hazzanim celebrated 150 years of the city's cantorate by holding a gala concert at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue last week.

Hundreds of people attended the Oct. 15 musical evening, which raised more than $50,000 for the Reena Foundation, which helps people with developmental disabilities; the Canadian Friends of Akim, which assists Israeli children and adults with intellectual disabilities, and the Toronto Cantorial Trust Fund, which provides scholarships to aspiring cantors.

The Toronto Council of Hazzanim consists of local Reform, Conservative and Orthodox cantors. Its goal is to preserve and support the cantorial art and profession, and offer a forum of networking and education for its members.

This year's anniversary concert was organized by Cantor Eliezer Kirshblum, who retired in 2008 after serving for 42 years at Adath Israel Congregation. It featured powerful and moving performances by Cantor Benzion Miller of New York, as well as by local cantors David Edwards, Tibor Kovari, Marshall Loomer, Beny Maissner, David Rosen and Alex Stein.

They were accompanied by Danny Gildar on the piano and an instrumental ensemble including Shelley Miller, Daniel Barnes and Doriann Forrester.

The event, which is usually held every two to three years, brings cantors together from across the city to share their love of spiritual music, Kirshblum said.

"The cantors donate their services in concert form. It's a special evening, because each cantor in his own right has a following at his own synagogue, but when you put them all together on one stage, that's a draw for the community."

Kirshblum, who was master of ceremonies, extended thanks to concert chairman Alex Eisen for his efforts in promoting the concert to the community and personally collecting funds for the cause.

Some of the evening's highlights included performances of classic melodies such as Ani Ma'amin, Pitchu Li and Tzadik Adoshem.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING
The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

KOFFLER CENTRE OF THE ARTS TO OPEN NEW DOWNTOWN HOME

The Koffler Centre of the Arts will soon open its new downtown headquarters at Artscape Youngplace, 180 Shaw St., just north of Queen Street. The 4,600-square-foot space will be the new home of the Koffler's administrative offices and the Koffler Gallery.

Koffler's offices and gallery have endured a nomadic existence for nearly five years since they vacated the old Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC), which was demolished about 2009. Koffler's off-site exhibitions have been shown in parking lots, bargain emporiums, abandoned houses, ferry docks, city sidewalks, hotels, clothing stores, synagogues and other locations.

The original plan was for the BJCC to be rebuilt on the same site within a short time, but the project has been delayed for the foreseeable future. "We've decided that it was to our advantage to have a permanent home, and that's why we moved downtown," said Tony Hewer, Koffler's head of communications and marketing. (The Koffler Centre's classes, however, still continue at the Prosserman JCC on Bathurst Street north of Sheppard Avenue.)

The Koffler Gallery will open its new space with the exhibition We're In The Library, featuring new works by seven Toronto artists about the history and context of the new space, which was formerly the library of the Shaw Street Public School. Artscape Youngplace and the new exhibition open with a public reception, Tuesday, Nov. 19, 5 to 9 p.m. www.koffler-arts.org

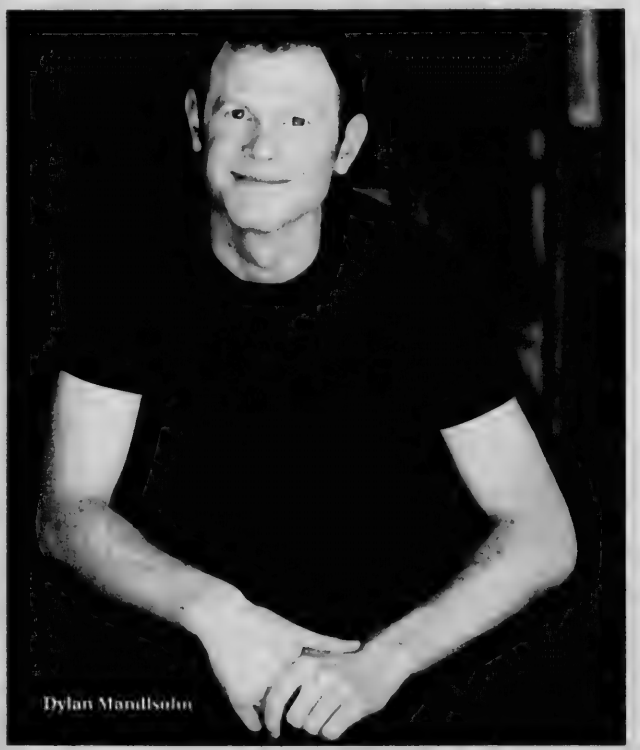
"It's nerve-wracking before I do it, but once I'm on stage and I'm doing well, all those nerves turn into a high. It's the biggest adrenaline rush ever," he said.



Dylan Mandlsohn

The Toronto native, 33, has taken his show on the road to most provinces in Canada and almost all 50 U.S. states, including Alaska, where he performed on a Disney cruise ship.

"Disney audiences are a little challenging, because they're really conservative, scared to laugh at anything edgy, so I had to clean things up for them," he said, describing the experience as "the mother of all corporate gigs" and almost like a form of church comedy.

By that he means there was often a delay between the jokes and the laughter, and he's convinced it's because audience members were asking themselves, "Would Jesus laugh at that?"

"I always thought I was bombing and they would laugh three seconds later. 'Yes, Jesus would approve,'" he said.

It was tough for this edgy comedian to come up with a completely clean act, but he said it helped him prepare to do other corporate gigs, and it helped him go from completely broke to earning six figures for a while. And that means he's able to take more risks these days.

Mandlsohn said he's always known he's wanted to be a comedian since he was a child. He would watch stand-up comedy shows with his father, and he found himself inspired by comedians such as Jim Carrey and Rich Little.

"I was fascinated that they could make people laugh, [even though] I never understood what they were saying at the time," he said. "I started memorizing these jokes that made no sense to me."

Early on, he figured out that his face was super flexible, he said, demonstrating his "rubber face."

When he was 17, he began developing his act, and soon he took part in amateur night at Yuk Yuk's. He got his start touring around the United States when he was a student at the University of Windsor, where he studied theatre. There were two comedy clubs in Windsor: Yuk Yuk's and Leo's Komedy Korner.

"They really took me and gave me a lot of stage time," he said.

With a bit of help, he was introduced to the comedy scene of nearby American cities, and soon enough, he was on the road performing fairly regularly.

The only states he could think of where he hasn't performed are Texas, Hawaii, Utah and Kansas.

He described American audiences as being more political and passionate than their Canadian counterparts. In fact, he said some comedians could get away with simply preaching to the choir, and the audiences would love it.

"If I was going into a town that's really Republican, I could just talk about 'those damn Democrats' and get these applause breaks and they think I did a great job even if it maybe wasn't that funny," he said.

Although he loves comedy, acting is another one of his loves. He went to teacher's college to cement the back-up plan that if things don't work out, he could always teach theatre and English. While he waits for his really big break, he does substitute teaching all around the city. That gives him the freedom to travel and take off for auditions as they come.

In addition to giving him the credentials to teach, teacher's college also gave him plenty of fodder for his act.

But he loves show business, and that's where he hopes to stay, even if it's not in stand-up comedy. He said one of his goals is to break into TV and film. He has some credits to his name – for example, a guest-starring role on the American TV series Nikita – but he's always looking to do more.

Yet he knows it all takes time.

He's met other comedians, include world-famous Russell Peters, who have given him that advice.

"'Don't worry about being better than all the headliners because you're not at that level. Just be the best guy at that level and you'll move up,'" he said Peters told him, back when Peters would perform in Windsor, before he became a mega-star.

"I thought that really helped me, because it made things not so overwhelming," Mandlsohn said. "It helps me focus more on what I need to do."

And he knows he's slowly making his way to the big leagues.

"I think it'll happen," he said. "I think pretty soon, things will start popping up in a really big kind of way."

Is social media a job killer?

Ask Ella
By Ella Burakowski

Dear Ella,

When it comes to academics, my son Zack is very smart, but when I think about how irresponsible he is about his future it makes me cringe.

Zack graduated with a degree in business, but he's not prepared to enter the job market.

He was among a pool of kids who were out to find a place for themselves in the working world, and the percentage of his classmates who actually succeeded in landing a position was smaller than we expected.

After a close friend of the family intervened and got him the lead, he had a very promising interview with a financial firm. Zack didn't get the position. We found out later that it wasn't because his marks were inadequate – in fact, his grades were excellent – or because he didn't interview well, but because the employer went to Zack's Twitter account and saw tweet after tweet about partying, accompanied by Instagram photos of Zack and his friends holding beers in the air and horsing around.

The interviewer told our friend off the record to tell this young man to clean up his social media accounts.

"Sure everyone in university parties, but not everyone is stupid enough to share it with the world in cyberspace," is what our friend was told.

The job was offered to someone with the same qualifications who didn't advertise his social indiscretions.

Zack maintains it had nothing to do with that. "Everybody has photos like that," was the answer I got when I confronted him.

There's no talking to him. He knows it all. On top of that, do you think he learned anything from this experience? Zack continues to enjoy his young adult years with his friends and share his experiences on social media sites.

He comes home at all hours, then sleeps in late, and when I ask him how the job hunt is going, he tells me he's doing his best.

I'm frustrated and angry, but what can I do? He's too old and won't listen to his mommy any longer.

Dangers of Social Media

Dear Dangers of Social Media

Social media can be a very powerful tool in the job market. In Zack's case, if he's truly serious about his job hunt, he needs to learn how to use social media to help him along, not ruin his chances.

When he posts a status update, he's not thinking about his future, he's connecting with his friends. His inability to understand the consequences shows Zack's lack of maturity and priorities.

At this stage in his life, Zack should be examining every word he shares with the world. Social media sites give a false sense of anonymity, but social media is anything but anonymous.

It's all about networking smartly. What greater way is there to reach firms and people who have a presence on Linkedin, Facebook and Twitter?

Zack may have a degree, but he hasn't shown a serious interest in finding a job. For starters, his interview was set up by a friend. Has he set up anything on his own? Has he had any other bites other than the arranged one? If Zack were serious, he wouldn't let his Facebook and Twitter photos stand in his way of finding work. As the old saying goes, you can lead a horse to water…

Employers want the complete package. There are plenty of excellent candidates to choose from. Besides looking for someone who is qualified, they look for a person who is well-rounded, well-spoken, passionate, bright (with common sense) and can think outside the box.

Perhaps Zack isn't hungry enough. You may have to look at his current living situation to see how comfortable you're making things for him. I'm sure Zack will come into his own, but in the meantime, you don't have to do his laundry and put three squares on the table every day.

When he begins to see his friends moving on, it will light a fire under him. He's an adult, and other than controlling his immediate environment in your home, you have little say in what he chooses to do with his life. You've done your best. Now take a back seat and let all the work you've put into your son have a chance to flourish.

Special to The CJN

Think back to the best hamburger that you ever had. You needed two hands to hold it and a lot of napkins to wipe away the juice. You will remember it had a toasty bun and was piled high with all the toppings you desired and topped off with your very favourite sauce. Can't wait to have one again? Well follow along with me, and together we will build your choice burger.

Pick Your Protein
fresh ground beef 20-30 per cent fat fresh lean ground beef
fresh ground chicken or turkey veggie – black beans, mushrooms, tofu

Pick Your Mix-ins
crushed Rice Krispies
crushed Corn Flakes
egg
fresh minced garlic
fresh finely chopped onion black pepper
fresh chopped herbs favourite steak spice soy sauce
cumin (especially for black bean burgers)

Pick Your Bread
hamburger bun kaiser bun onion bun ciabatta roll
brown, rye or white bread
multigrain bun

Pick Your Hot Toppings fried caramelized onions sautéed mushrooms fried egg
grilled pineapple rings

Pick Your Cold Toppings avocado or guacamole pesto lettuce sliced tomatoes sweet pickle relish
sliced coloured peppers coleslaw roasted red pepper
fresh onion slices sliced pickles
sliced olives
crunchy potato chips, wide chow mein noodles or corn chips

Pick Your Sauce
mustard or honey mustard ketchup
barbecue sauce
Buffalo wings sauce
pizza sauce
Thai sweet chili sauce
teriyaki Sauce

Hamburger Guidelines:

Make sure your meat is fresh. Keep meat cold until mixing and cold until cooking.

Combine your choice of mix-ins with the ground meat. Consider using eggs or egg whites to help bind the mixture together.

Make uniform-sized patties, about four ounces each, for diner-style burgers cooked on a griddle or frying pan, and about five ounces each for barbecued burgers.

After the patties are made, gently push one finger into the middle to create a small indentation. This will make certain that your burger will cook evenly.

Sprinkle salt over the outside of the patties, then spread a thin layer of oil over the patty. This will help sear the meat, keep moisture inside and reduce sticking to the grill or griddle.

Grill burgers three to four minutes on each side for medium-rare, five to six minutes on each side for medium-well. Remember, it depends on the thickness of the burger – it doesn't hurt to check the doneness along the way by cutting into a burger. Better safe than sorry.

To cook on a griddle, lightly oil griddle, add burgers when griddle begins to smoke. Gently press them down and cook about 4 to 5 minutes per side.

With either method of cooking, don't squish the meat with the spatula, or you will have dry burgers.

Flip burgers only once.

To toast buns or bread on the grill, brush with extra virgin olive oil and place on grill or griddle for 1-2 minutes and set aside.

That's all there is to it. Not bad, eh? So take some time to create your new hamburger memories.

Famed developer was known for tzedakah

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Paul Reichmann was remembered as a giant in the real estate field, who, along with his brothers, earned billions from their innovative and ambitious projects, but who also gave tens of millions to a wide range of community organizations.

Reichmann, a Hungarian-born developer and philanthropist, died late last week at 83. He had been ill and bed-ridden for some time.

A senior staff member at one of the Reichmann-supported Orthodox institutions in Toronto compared him to a modern-day Rothschild.

His passing was noted by a variety of business publications and dailies for leading his family's Olympia & York Developments Ltd. in designing and constructing landmark projects, including London's Canary Wharf and New York's World Financial Center.

Paul Reichmann

According to author Anthony Bianco, who wrote a book about the family, Olympia & York was "the greatest property development company in western history."

At its height in 1988, the cumulative wealth of the Reichmann brothers – Paul, Albert and Ralph – was estimated at $9.2 billion by Forbes magazine. Reichmann purchased eight Manhattan office buildings in 1977 for more than $300 million (all figures US). Ten years later they were worth $3 billion.

According to JTA, the company built nearly 100 buildings in the Toronto area during its first 15 years of operation. Among the family's projects was First Canadian Place, the tallest bank tower in the world at 72 storeys when it was completed in 1975.

By 1992, Olympia & York was forced to seek bankruptcy protection when loans to finance Canary Wharf came due before tenants could be found for the development.

The crisis affected the family's ability to support a number of philanthropic projects, which, at their height, amounted to some $50 million a year, according to the New York Times.

The Reichmanns were instrumental in founding Kollel Toronto, a community learning institution and adult education centre.

"It was his idea and his family's to start the Toronto kollel," said a senior staff member who asked that his name not be used.

"He came up with the idea of having a kollel and getting the younger crowd to stay in town. People were moving to New York or perhaps Israel," he said.

When the kollel was founded in 1970, "it was kind of an experiment. It was a first. There was no such thing."

"The idea was to bring a group of young scholars to town, and that would attract younger people, [and] the schools would get larger and attract more people."

The kollel proved successful in stemming the outflow of young Orthodox people, he added.

Trenton school plans ambitious Shoah memorial

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

As the Pebbles for Peace project in Trenton, Ont., nears its goal of collecting six million pebbles to represent the number of Jewish Holocaust victims, the project's leaders have embarked on a $2-million fundraising initiative to build a memorial and community theatre for their town.

Inspired by Paper Clips – a documentary about a campaign led by the staff and students of Whitwell Middle School in Tennessee to collect six million paper clips in honour of Jewish Holocaust victims – staff and students at the Goodwin Learning Centre in Trenton have spent the last six years working on a similar project to help students understand "what six million looks like."

When teacher Melissa Mikel and Linda Goodwin, the principal and founder of the private school that currently serves 42 students – none of them Jewish – spoke to The CJN in 2007, the project had just been launched, and the nearly 5,550 pebbles they had collected were being kept "neatly in a bin."

Mtl. Le Mood Fest

MONTREAL — More than 1,000 participants are expected at Montreal's third annual Le Mood Festival of Unexpected Jewish Learning, Arts and Culture on Nov. 3. Among the marquee speakers are Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau, environmentalist David Suzuki and Jewlicious.com founder David Abitbol. Inspired by the 30-year-old annual Limmud in England, Le Mood is part of the growing network of 58 similar festivals in 28 countries.

Bomb Iran: Adelson

NEW YORK — U.S. philanthropist Sheldon Adelson, a top backer of Republican and right-wing pro-Israel causes, advocated bombing Iran with a nuclear device as a means of negotiation. "You pick up your cellphone and you call somewhere in Nebraska and you say 'OK, let it go,' and so there's an atomic weapon [that] goes over, ballistic missiles in the middle of the desert that doesn't hurt a soul, maybe a couple of rattlesnakes and scorpions," Adelson, a casino magnate, said Oct. 22 at Yeshiva University. "And then you say, 'See? The next one is in the middle of Tehran.'" Adelson, a major backer of Birthright Israel who owns the newspaper Israel Hayom and is close to Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, was criticizing the Obama administration's readiness to negotiate with Iran on its nuclear weapons program.

New Micro-grants

WASHINGTON — A new micro-grants initiative will award funding of up to $1,000 each for 50 different project ideas. The #MakeItHappen micro-grants initiative, for creating Jewish experiences in communities around the world, was announced last week by the Charles and Lynn Schusterman Philanthropic Network. Submission deadline is Dec. 6 and the ideas will be selected on a rolling basis. Anyone 18 and older can submit a project idea. The project must occur before May 31. Five of the ideas could receive funding of up to $5,000.

Israeli Schools Sign Deal With U de M

MONTREAL — Memorandums of understanding were signed between the Université de Montréal (U de M) and two Israeli universities: the Technion and University of Haifa.

The signings took place during U de M's first mission to Israel, led by rector Guy Breton, earlier this month.

Guy Breton

These preliminary general agreements were described as a first step toward future academic co-operation, such as in research or faculty/student exchange, by Miriam Azogui-Halbwax, associate director of community and university relations for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), which organized the trip.

The Technion and U de M's medicine faculties inked a separate agreement.

The U de M also entered into discussions on collaboration with Hebrew University, Tel Aviv University, the Weizmann Institute, Ben-Gurion University, and Bar-Ilan University.

Azogui-Halbwax said the delegation was impressed by the dynamism of Israeli society and the importance Israel places on higher education.

CIJA views the mission as an important milestone in the relationship between the Montreal Jewish community and the U de M, which has been the training ground for many of Quebec's leading business, professional and civic leaders.

Bathurst Street landmark Daiter's up for sale

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Daiter's, the family-run deli and market that has been a fixture on Bathurst Street since 1964, will be closing its doors.

The Daiter family announced last week that it has put the building up for sale. According to the multiple listing service of the Toronto Real Estate Board, the asking price for the property is just under $5 million.

The family will be selling the building but not the business, said Stephen and Joel Daiter, the brothers who operate the market. Though they are the third generation of their family to run a retail outlet under the family name, none of their children are interested in continuing the family legacy.

"We're the third generation, but we don't have a fourth," said Joel.

The family is not intent on turning over the business to someone else to carry on.

"My dad worked very hard, he was a hard-working man," said Stephen. "He said, 'Don't sell the name because you don't want someone to harm the name.'"

The store is a landmark in the Bathurst Street corridor. With 3,000 square feet of retail space it provides traditional Jewish fare, including blintzes, gefilte fish, schmaltz herring, locally crafted cheeses, pastry, and more contemporary items such as salads and sandwiches.

Though the brothers are closing the retail outlet, the Daiter name will continue to be associated with the food business. Stephen and Joel said they want to devote more time to catering and wholesale sales, though from a new location.

Selling prepared foods such as soup and other items to big box grocers has become an important part of the business, they said. In addition, their catering business for simchahs and shivahs has grown as well.

Iran more likely to ape North Korea than Libya

Early last month, following Iranian President Hassan Rouhani's "charm offensive" at the UN, this column noted widespread media skepticism about Iran's nuclear intentions.

The influential Economist magazine led the way, saying (Sept. 28) that "No matter how friendly Iran suddenly appears, any talks [about its nuclear program] will be protracted and theatrical," fuelling the suspicion that Tehran "is merely buying time for its centrifuges."

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

Nonetheless, just a couple of weeks later, when nuclear talks were held in Geneva (Oct. 15-16), and reports circulated of western enthusiasm for signs of Iranian flexibility (although no official details were released), even the Economist shifted its line to what it called in its Oct. 19 editorial "mild optimism."

That seemed to set the tone for a number of other media outlets that had previously shared the magazine's pronounced skepticism.

It's not that the Economist and other publications all suddenly shifted 180 degrees. Yet, as the Economist put it, although in Geneva "[t]here was no breakthrough… the atmosphere was good enough to create hope that a deal of some sort could be done next year."

The word "hope" is key. We've heard it many times in the past few years to describe events in the broader Middle East – first the hope that the Arab Spring would lead to liberal democracy, then the hope that the illiberal Islamists who rose to power would be tolerant and pragmatic, then the hope that Iranian-backed Syrian President Bashar Assad would be removed from power. The list goes on. But in each case, the hope has been dashed.

Now the latest manifestation of hope is that Iran is truly ready to cut a deal with the West and give up the nuclear weapons program it swears it has never been engaged in (even in the face of evidence of systematic deception about its intentions). Although Rouhani himself has played a central role in this past deception, many are now willing to trust what they see as his sincerity. Iran, after all, is desperate for relief from biting economic sanctions, and Rouhani has been tasked with finding a formula on the nuclear file that will lead to the end of sanctions.

Israel (along with Saudi Arabia) is the odd country out in insisting that Iran, once again, is not to be trusted, even though it accepts that, ideally, a negotiated resolution of the nuclear problem would be preferred – preferred, that is, to the use of force.

In his Oct. 19 National Post column "A second chance to strike first," Robert Fulford recounted remarks on the Iranian nuclear issue by well-known Israeli writer Yossi Klein Halevi, who met with some journalists earlier this month in Toronto.

This is the 40th anniversary of the Yom Kippur War and, as Fulford put it, "For many Israelis, it's a piece of history that carries important lessons for the present."

In 1973, faced with imminent threats from Egypt and Syria, then-Israeli prime minister Golda Meir "decided against a pre-emptive strike, fearing a negative response from Washington… Now, with the looming possibility of an Iranian nuclear bomb, Israelis face another danger of falling asleep. A pre-emptive strike is constantly debated," Fulford wrote.

In conversation with Steve Paikin, host of TVO's The Agenda, Klein Halevi argued that Iran has two models to consider: be like Libya's Moammar Gadhafi who, having given up his nuclear weapons program, was attacked and ended up dead, or follow North Korea's lead, deceive the international community, develop nuclear weapons, and become "essentially untouchable."

As Klein Halevi said: "The notion that negotiations are going to convince Iran to give up a nuclear program that has been the centre point of its ambitions for the last 30 years, right at the moment when it's so close and say, 'Okay, we're going the route of Gadhafi'…' I think is an example of willful naiveté that so much of the West has adopted and which, frankly, from where I sit in Jerusalem, is inexplicable."

Paul Michaels is director of research and senior media relations for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

Opening the doors

In 2011, Gershon Hundert, Derek Penslar and David Novak were inducted into the Royal Society of Canada, the first Jewish studies professors to receive this honour. For many, including the honorees, the event highlighted the fact that the academic world has been paying more attention to Jewish scholars than the Jewish community itself.

The fact that Judaism can be studied at universities alongside all the great disciplines is an amazing development that our ancestors could never have imagined and one that eludes many Jewish communities in the Diaspora even today.

Guest Editorial

It is self-evident that research done by Jewish studies scholars has yielded great insight into our culture and has opened the doors of Jewish learning for people who would have never dared engage with it in more traditional forums, such as yeshivas and synagogues. At a time when many such forums struggle to appear more pluralistic in order to attract disaffected Jews, university departments of Jewish studies have long modelled true pluralism by simply providing a space where all are welcome to study without being judged.

Students find that the academic study of Judaism provides an exciting vantage point. They are delighted at their encounter with the totality of Jewish civilization, having grown up in institutions that could only provide limited vistas. When sources are studied without prejudice, new truths emerge about the great movements and figures of Jewish history. The broader historical and cultural contexts provided reveal how Judaism has always been in dialogue with the world, open to and affected by its surroundings, even as it maintained its unique character and made its own contributions.

Some feel that Judaism is in some way diminished by academic treatment, which demystifies it. But many more ask why they were not given the keys to its fascinating insights earlier. Jewish studies at universities also makes Jews and Judaism more accessible to non-Jews, who take these courses in notable numbers and learn to appreciate the Jewish experience. In this way, the academy fosters the type of mutual understanding that is so painfully absent in other realms of society.

For all these reasons, the Jewish community should support, nurture, and take advantage of departments and programs of Jewish studies. It should aim to have more elementary and high school Jewish studies teachers study Judaism in university, as well as encourage people to attend Jewish studies public lectures when they are offered, buy and read the books produced by scholars, invite more scholars to speak in synagogues, schools and community events, and write and read more articles about groundbreaking developments in the field of Jewish studies.

The community should strongly back Jewish studies programs and departments financially as well. These courses will never attract as many students as Economics 101 or Introduction to Psychology, so their position on campus is always fragile, especially in these times of unprecedented cutbacks and tight budgets. Visionary community support can ensure the field of Jewish studies remains on campus with exciting and broad course offerings, opening the widest possible doors to our timeless heritage.

Remember the FSU Shoah survivors

It is as though the Iron Curtain was never lifted. Another year, another Holocaust Education Week (HEW) in the offing, another lost opportunity for it to bring its formidable expertise to examine the fate of tens of thousands of Holocaust survivors still living in countries of the former Soviet Union.

Surely this vast constituency is worthy of study, and not only objectively as a scholarly inquiry, but subjectively to explore the puzzling paradox of a caring people who neglect their own.

Our lack of engagement personally and communally with them is an issue we should confront now, while they are still with us.

Overwhelmingly we bundle these survivors with the needy poor, a catch-all that dodges their status as a people whose plight is a direct result of what we absolutely and directly share with them: being Jews.

LET THEM GO...

Ron Arad, Zachary Baumel, Zvi Feldman, Guy Hever, Yehuda Katz

May the next HEW conference include the survivors living in the former Soviet Union in its scholarly embrace. No longer out of reach, behind an Iron Curtain that's no longer there, these patient people have been waiting to tell their stories.

Library exhibit was a success

The Hamilton Public Library's recent exhibit showcasing two of Israel's charitable programs with an international reach that have benevolently touched the lives of so many, without regard for race, religion or nationality, were motivated only by an unconditional desire to help those who face the darkest moments of their lives ("Exhibit caused too much damage," Letters, The CJN, Oct. 17).

As members of Hamilton Jewish Federation's public relations committee, which helped put on the exhibit, my colleagues and I are well aware of one repeated criticism of the federation and of library officials regarding the initiatives we took related to last year's Gaza exhibit and our subsequent recent library exhibit. However, it is important to be aware that this isolated complaint stands alone against a backdrop of overwhelming support and accolades received from so many in our Jewish community, and from the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

We must speak with unity

I concur with Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs CEO Shimon Fogel when he says, "We can't have it both ways" (The CJN, Oct. 3). Truer and more important words have never been uttered.

We should have it one way – meaning, that the Jewish community from the grassroots level and up should speak with one united voice, at least on major issues.

Too often, most dedicated groups, selfless and tireless individuals and small organizations are seeking guidance, struggling for much-needed support from the mainstream organizations, when taking a stand, whether by open protest or lectures, are ignored, alienated and barely listened to.

We are fortunate to have the Stephen Harper government on our side, but in many cases we must fend for our own interests, i.e., combat the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement, Israeli Apartheid Week, and the demonization of Israel in the media, academia and some religious institutions.

We, the Jewish People, must take a united stand and act and speak with one voice, at least on issues of major concern for all of us.

Parents do not become children

We do not become parents to our parents ("Parenting the parent," The CJN, Oct. 10).

We do not reduce them to children. We remain the children and they the parents, regardless of their infirmities. The role we adult children take on is filial maturity.

The Torah tells us to honour our parents and not to consider them as burdens. This is not the Jewish way of behaving. Honour thy mother and father.

When life does not go the way we want it to, it does not mean that life is not fair. Life is full of ups and downs, and God is not in the business of what is fair, not fair or unjust. He gives us life and we are responsible for doing good.

Just live and do the best you can with what you have been given.

Search for lost pre-WWII art bears fruit in Toronto

Fern Smiley

Elizabeth Rynecki has always wondered what the watercolour, Prayer, painted by her great-grandfather, Moshe Rynecki, looked like in its entirety.

At a talk she gave earlier this month at the University of Toronto's Centre for Jewish Studies, titled "Chasing Portraits: a Great-Granddaughter's Search for her Lost Art Legacy," she displayed a slide of the watercolour.

The intense energy of the congregants praying the Shema in the soulful painting abruptly halts on two opposite corners. One third of her image was missing, twice diagonally slashed as if amputated to save the rest.

Later, following her presentation, in a remarkable turn of events, Rynecki would find out just what the original watercolour looked like.

Rynecki's efforts to find her great-grandfather's paintings that were lost in the Holocaust are partly affected by her graduate work examining the voice of the second generation within Holocaust discourse.

Through the art of her great-grandfather and its assemblage, Rynecki would find for herself meaning in the recovery of memory, a responsibility she has fully embraced in recent years through social media and documentary filmmaking.

Rynecki, who earned a master's degree in rhetoric and speech communication at the University of California, Davis, and now lives in Oakland, Calif., knows little about her family's story of survival.

Elizabeth Rynecki and Prof. Barry Walfish go over the letters and photos from the Otto Schneid archives.

Elizabeth Rynecki's slide of the watercolour Prayer, painted by her great-grandfather Moshe, was missing around one-third, slashed diagonally on both corners.

What she does know is that at the outbreak of World War II, Moshe Rynecki became concerned about preserving his life's work – more than 800 paintings and sculptures – and that in the early days of the war, he divided his oeuvre into bundles and hid them in and around Warsaw in an effort to protect them.

Moshe perished in Majdanek, and after the war, the family recovered approximately 100 paintings in the cellar of a home in Warsaw's Praga district.

His works – each depicting Jewish spiritual, communal or commercial life in prewar Poland – have seeped into museums and private hands.

One story she told was of partisan fighters who, on their walk back into Poland from Russia, bought a bundle of paintings from a farmer who had stored the works during the war, which is why she came to Toronto – to visit the home where four of her great-grandfather's paintings hang, beautifully framed, and treasured by a family who feel fortunate to have them.

Rynecki described the difficulties facing most heirs around the issues of asserting claims and talked about her choice to take a different route – not as a claimant, but as a historian.

While it's possible that much of Moshe's extant oeuvre has been stolen, this can't be easily proven. Since Moshe's work was never recorded or catalogued, it's impossible to prove whether paintings that surface at auctions, for example, came from the bundles.

As an art historian, Rynecki can search for her great-grandfather's paintings, establish relationships with those who have his pieces, and potentially learn the stories that tie all of those who have experienced the work into a larger narrative.

In return, she receives gifts, and that night at her talk, Prof. Barry Walfish gave her several more.

After the questions ended, he raised his hand and explained to Rynecki and the audience that the University of Toronto Library, where Walfish works as a Judaica specialist, holds handwritten letters of her great-grandfather as well as more than a dozen photographs of his paintings. Among them was a photo of the damaged painting she showed during her talk.

In the rain, after a long lecture, Walfish accompanied Rynecki to the Thomas Fisher Rare Book Library, where he opened two archival boxes from the Otto Schneid archives.

Schneid, a European-born Polish painter, sculptor and historian, wrote a book on modern Jewish art in the Diaspora. In his research, he solicited autobiographies and photos of artwork from dozens of Jewish artists in Europe, including Moshe.

In 1938, after Germany's annexation of Austria, the printing of his authoritative book by his Viennese publisher was halted by the Nazis. Schneid fled Poland for Palestine, but never saw his book in print. A Hebrew version that he prepared in Israel and was ready for publication in 1957 also never saw the light of day. The unpublished manuscripts, in German and Hebrew, along with all the background material he collected, were gifted to the Fisher Library by his widow, Miriam, in 2002.

The photograph of the original painting (Courtesy of the Thomas Rare Book Library, University of Toronto)

Out of the boxed archives came more than a dozen photos of paintings Rynecki had never seen before, including one called Kabbalist and one haunting deathbed scene of Moshe's own father, as well as the intact photographic reproduction of his watercolour Prayer, and a handwritten letter in Yiddish from Moshe to Schneid, introducing himself, which begins: "I was born an artist…"

"I am delighted I was able to help Elizabeth in her quest for information on her great-grandfather's artistic legacy," Walfish said later.

"The Schneid archive is a wonderful resource for the study of Jewish art in Europe in the interwar period. Many of the artists included in it perished in the Holocaust. I hope that this discovery will help get the word out and bring more scholars and seekers to our door."

You can find out more about Rynecki and her search for her great-grandfather's works on her website, www.rynecki.org.

Lost (and found) in translation

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

One long ago semester, as a student, I earned pocket money by cataloguing books at my university's international affairs library. At the time, countries paid off part of their foreign debts by sending newly published books to designated libraries, and the library where I worked received quarterly shipments of volumes from the Middle East. My job was to integrate these new books into our library. In the non-digitized environment of the time, this meant integrating Hebrew and Arabic books into the library's card catalog system.

This was simpler than you'd think, as each shipment came with translated and transliterated author and title listings, and some limited information on each volume. My knowledge of Hebrew allowed me to add useful information to the library's record. For the Arabic books, I could only utilize the data provided, as I had studied spoken Arabic, but not written Arabic. On slow days, I used my cataloguing chores to teach myself the rudiments of written Arabic, matching the curvy shapes of Arabic letters with their transliterated representations. The knowledge gained was neither supple nor lasting, alas, but for a while I could make out some basic textual information.

The static format of the time has long since given way to the fluidity of electronic media. My students have never shredded their cuticles flipping through card catalogs. Except for those with a penchant for antiques, I doubt that many even know what a card catalog is. One of my favorite hotels in Manhattan is the Library Hotel, so named because of its proximity to the New York public library. The hotel's decor picks up playfully on this association, with rooms numbered and decorated according to the Dewey decimal system. Behind the reception desk is an old, wooden card catalog chest. The first time I checked in, I asked the hotel agent if was being used for anything. "No," he responded. "It's merely a vestigial remnant."

Today we find information – about books and anything else – much more efficiently. And the technologies that help us to do so also shield us from struggling through encounters with unfamiliar languages. In online search results, for instance, webpages in languages we can't read can be instantly translated, pre-empting a gaze at incomprehensible symbols. On computers, tablets and even phones, we can feed in words, even paragraphs, in almost any language and almost instantly receive a translation. Those translations are awkward, non-idiomatic and sometimes amusing, but they give us the gist of what we want to know.

I harbour no secret yearning for the card catalogue days, but something important is lost when language unfamiliarity is so smoothed over as to be erased. Encountering foreign and familiar tongues simultaneously and in tension with one another stretches us, teaches us and broadens us in unique ways. One way where technology helps that encounter is by making foreign, subtitled media easily available for viewing.

My family, for example, keeps up with current spoken Hebrew when we're not in Israel by watching Israeli films and TV series at home, on DVDs or via the web. We hear different registers of language – formal, informal, slang – as well as nuanced differences of various socio-economic, ethnic and professional groups.

Most difficult for us to catch are IDF-slang and teen-speak. IDF slang proliferates faster than an Israeli jet, based on acronyms, command terms, and general bawdiness. Even reservists confess to sometimes needing a refresher course. Teen-speak, too, evolves quickly. Just as elsewhere, Israeli teens speak quickly, mumble, swallow syllables and baffle their elders. In addition, current Israeli movies and TV series often feature extended dialogue in other languages, such as Arabic, Yiddish or Russian. That's where subtitles come in – sometimes in Hebrew, sometimes in English – allowing viewers to simultaneously encounter the unfamiliar and the familiar.

Subtitles are less a science than an art. Like most translations, they're rarely perfect. But experienced together with the original, they facilitate language learning. Even more importantly, the meeting of original and translation highlights the rich cultural texture that language carries and transmits.

What should we do about intermarriage?

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

A growing number of members of our community are terminal Jews. Even if their children and grandchildren are halachically Jewish, their commitment to Judaism may be waning. One of the main reasons is intermarriage. As individual Jews, we've never had it so good, yet the threat to our collective survival is formidable, although – or because – we now live in freedom and relative prosperity.

That's how I read two articles by Prof. Jack Wertheimer of the Jewish Theological Seminary in the online magazine Mosaic. A subsequently published and much debated report by the Pew Research Center about Jewish life in the United States can be seen as confirmation of his bleak prognosis: the intermarriage rate there between 2000 and 2013 is 58 per cent.

Though we'd like to believe that the situation in Canada is less acute, the trend is the same.

Wertheimer points an accusing finger at American Jewish leaders, among whom "any concerns are swept under the carpet and the talk is of cherishing 'diversity' and doing everything to foster 'inclusiveness.'" He believes the organized community can do much more to help Jews to marry Jews by providing better opportunities for socializing and by making greater efforts to encourage non-Jewish marriage partners to embrace Judaism.

But he's critical of the practice in liberal communities of trying to accommodate intermarried couples. He implies that in the not-too-distant future, only the Orthodox will survive as Jews in the Diaspora. Though currently in the United States only some 10 per cent describe themselves as Orthodox, their number - particularly among haredim – is likely to remain steady or increase, because their children marry Jews, marry early and have large families.

One of the respondents to Wertheimer's original essay was Rabbi Eric Yoffie, immediate past president of the Union for Reform Judaism. He's refreshingly optimistic about the future of the Jewish People, despite the intermarriage rate, because he has faith in the outreach efforts of his movement.

Rabbi Yoffie argues that the liberal stance is the best way to integrate non-Jewish spouses, if not by conversion then at least by encouraging them to bring up their children as Jews. Castigating and isolating them is bound to have the opposite effect to become a self-fulfilling prophecy of doom and gloom.

Other respondents presented variants on the same theme in the endearing, yet perhaps naive, American belief that every problem must have a solution. Those who celebrate the freedom and the opportunities that Jews nowadays have in the Diaspora in general and the United States in particular have no desire to return to any form of ghetto, even if it would reduce intermarriage. Some think that such a return, even if it were possible, would greatly inhibit Judaism from flourishing as it does now.

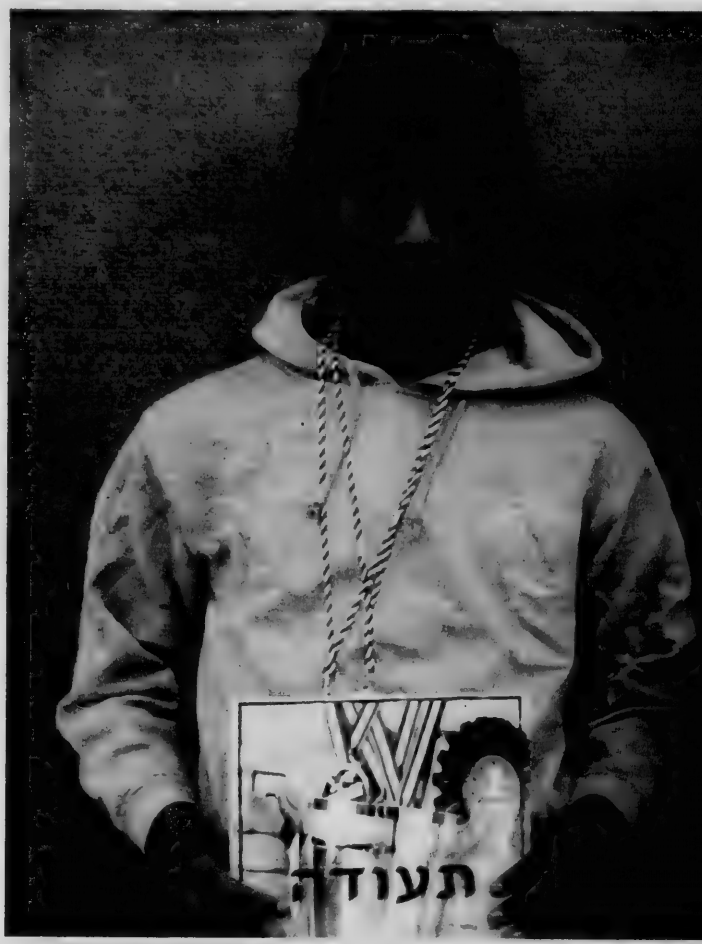
After all, the Pew Research Center report shows that there are, in fact, many more Jews in America today, at least by self-definition, than previously thought. Opportunities for serious Jewish studies at universities and other institutions in the Diaspora, coupled with the rich and varied activities in the major Jewish centers, provide much of the encouraging evidence.

Thus Doug Rushkoff, author of Nothing Sacred: The Truth About Judaism: "As I see it, Judaism is in the midst of one of its greatest-ever renaissances. The quality and depth of Jewish worship and study has never been stronger or more varied than today. Anyone who wants to learn, find a community, or engage in the world Jewishly can do so – and on his or her own terms."

Perhaps if we were more enthusiastic about the achievements in contemporary Jewish life and less obsessed by its problems, we might find it easier to attract those who at present manifest their marginality by marrying "out." The best way of responding to the challenge of intermarriage may be to agonize less and celebrate more by way of positive reinforcement.

A story has it that the biblical Abraham, on his way to obey God's command to sacrifice his son Isaac, is intercepted by Satan, who, in his clever way, tells Abraham that if he kills Isaac, it'll be the end of the Jewish people. To which Abraham replies: "My task is to do God's will. Jewish survival is God's problem."

The best way to deal with intermarriage may be for us not to preach against it, but do God's will as best we can – and leave the rest to God.



In the three short years since he and his family made aliyah, 12-year old Tzasfahon Aginahu has learned the fundamentals of Hebrew and mathematics, all without any previous formal education.

Currently attending elementary school, Tzasfahon is one of many Ethiopian-born students who benefit from participating in UJA Federation supported initiatives including a hot lunch program and the Moriah Literacy Program. Through Moriah, students in Israel, particularly new immigrants, gain strong Hebrew literacy.

"Through the literacy program, and the extra help and instruction it provides, Tzasfahon has learned necessary skills that will be useful to his future," says his teacher, Yehudit. "The program helps us keep kids motivated, and ensures that no student falls behind."

At home, Tzasfahon resides in a small 2-bedroom apartment with his parents and five siblings. As second eldest, he often helps his mother cook, clean, and prepare for Shabbat.

Tzasfahon represents the myriad of new immigrants arriving in Israel without any education, who, through UJA-funded programs like the Moriah Literacy Program, are able to close education gaps and prepare for a bright and successful future.

Koffler Centre gets home in downtown Toronto

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

For the first time in four years, the Koffler Centre of the Arts will have its own home.

The centre's gallery and administrative offices will move into their new downtown location at Artscape Youngplace, at 180 Shaw St., in the former Shaw Street Public School, just north of Queen Street West, on Nov. 19.

Tony Hewer, Koffler's head of communcations and marketing, said that since the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre closed about four years ago, the centre's gallery exhibits have been displayed at various locations around the city.

"The gallery closed when the BJCC closed, and we've been homeless since then. When the opportunity for a five-year lease was presented to us, we were happy for the chance to have a stable home for at least the next five years."

Hewer stressed that the eentre will continue to offer its instructional programs, such as visual arts and ceramics, at the Prosserman JCC in North York and the Schwartz-Reisman Centre in Vaughan. Multi-disciplinary programs, such as concerts, literary events and artist residencies will continue at off-site locations.

Artscape Youngplace is a community cultural hub project developed and managed by Artscape, which describes itself as "a leading practitioner in multi-tenant space development for the arts and culture sector."

Other arts-based organizations in the building include SKETCH, the Luminato Festival, the Centre of Indigenous Theatre, the Intergalactic Arts Collective and the Small World Music Society.

The gallery will open its new space, Nov. 19, from 5 to 9 p.m., with the inaugural exhibition We're in the Library, featuring seven Toronto artists who have created new works in response to the context and history of the Koffler Centre's new space, which was formerly the school library.

The artists examine the notion of the school library as a place of exploration, intellectual inquiry and social interaction. Projects included print, sculptural, sound and video installations.

Upcoming exhibitions in the new space include Sigalit Landau's Moving to Stand Still, Feb. 6 to April 14. The exhibition is a retrospective of Landau's major video works that offer a poetic investigation of the political and environmental realities of her native Israel.

The Koffler Centre's new home

The Koffler exhibition is the only North American showing on an international tour that includes Moscow, Johannesburg, Be'er Sheva, Rome and Gdansk.

Hewer said that to coincide with its move downtown, the Koffler Centre has refreshed its brand identity with a new quarterly program and exhibition booklet, as well as a redesigned website to be launched next month.

Refugee numbers inflated by bogus claims

UN agency promotes Palestinian agenda: scholar

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

It is pretty much accepted that around 650,000 to 700,000 Palestinians became refugees during and after creation of the State of Israel. Whether they left on their own or were pushed out remains an issue that's hotly contested.

It turns out there's also plenty of disagreement as to how many Palestinians should be considered refugees today.

According to the figures compiled by the United Nations Refugee and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA), the figure stands at some seven million, or more.

Asaf Romirowsky

Not so, said Asaf Romirowsky, an adjunct scholar at the Foundation for the Defence of Democracies and Middle East Forum. That figure is wildly inflated by bogus claims, by those who want to benefit from funds allocated to refugees and particularly by the very definition of "refugee" itself.

Of the number of people who might have been considered refugees 67 years ago, only about 30,000 remain. The others would not be refugees under any standard definition of the term, said Romirowsky, a former Israel Defence Forces international relations liaison officer in the West Bank and Jordan.

Romirowsky was in Toronto and Hamilton last week to address audiences as a guest of the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR). He said UNRWA "has the most expansive definition of refugees in the world today." It includes any Arab living in the area from 1946 to 1948, including temporary workers, as well as their descendants.

It's the latter that really inflates the refugee numbers. Nowhere else are the children and grandchildren of refugees considered refugees. Under the definition employed by the UN's main refugee agency, UNHCR, which is mandated to assist all the other refugees in the world, refugee status is not something that can be inherited, he said.

UNHCR attempts to settle refugees in host countries, something Palestinians and UNRWA have long rejected. Palestinian identity is wrapped up in self-perception as refugees and Israel's foes long ago recognized that as a way to keep the conflict at the boiling point, Romirowsky said.

"It is the main ingredient for ensuring the longevity and continuation of the conflict from generation to generation," he stated.

UNRWA is something unique unto itself, he continued. Its 30,000 employees – UNHCR employs only around 6,000 people – are highly sympathetic to the Palestinian narrative, which isn't surprising, given the vast majority of UNRWA's staff are Palestinians.

UNRWA advances the Palestinian agenda: its school textbooks are rife with calls to violence and the denial of a Jewish link to the Land of Israel, and it has adopted the Palestinian claim of a "Right to Return," which links any peace with Israel to the return of million of "refugees" to Israeli territory.

UNRWA long ago gave up any hint of neutrality in the conflict, he maintained.

Romirowsky noted that Peter Hansen, the former UNRWA commissioner-general in Gaza, stated in 2004: "I am sure that there are Hamas members on the UNRWA payroll, and I don't see that as a crime... we do not do political vetting and exclude people from one persuasion as against another."

Furthermore, UNRWA is a self-perpetuating bureaucracy. It subsists on donations from private and state contributors.

"UNRWA learned since its inception that there's always a need for more and more money. It learned that the Arab world would give the money as long as it became the voice of the Palestinian people," Romirowsky stated.

Canada has de-funded UNRWA because of its lack of accountability and transparency, though the United States and the European Union continue to send it money every year. The U.S. contribution runs to some $230 million (US), but recently, Sen. Mark Kirk has initiated calls for more accountability for those funds.

"They asked for an audit and [UNRWA] went ballistic," Romirowsky said.

Steps have also been taken by individual U.S. members of Congress who have called for "an end date for the right of return." Based on the way UNRWA defines refugees, the number is bound to expand indefinitely, a situation that's ultimately unsustainable, he suggested.

Shul named community hub

CJN Staff

Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue recently dedicated itself as a "community hub" for Bathurst Manor after making a number of upgrades to its building.

The project, made possible with a $130,000 Ontario Trillium Foundation grant, $75,000 grant from the Canadian government, and donations from Beth Emeth donors, includes an accessibility elevator, named Shelley's Elevator; a ramp, named the Sam and Rose Pacht and Family Accessibility ramp; electronic doors, and an emergency generator.

The Ruth Kelman Centre, located on the synagogue's lower level, has been renamed the Rabbi Joseph and Ruth Kelman Centre, and is now accessible by elevator.

Rabbi Kelman, the synagogue's founding spiritual leader, was an advocate on behalf of people with special needs. The centre has been used for more than 50 years by the Kadima Centre, the synagogue's program for adults with special needs.

Michael Kerzner, the synagogue's chairman of the board, said that "this is only the beginning of the expanded service we can provide to the community. We look forward to many more opportunities to serving the community at large."

He said that the synagogue has witnessed an increase in the number of special needs individuals served on a weekly basis. "Out of the Cold volunteers have used the elevator to transport many donated items, and Gan Yeladim Day Care Centre has used the elevator to avoid trips and falls on the stairs.

"During the power outage as a result of the rain storm on July 8, Beth Emeth was the only beacon of light in the neighbourhood."

Eva's Initiatives, which provides safe shelter and a range of services for homeless youth, has signed an agreement with Beth Emeth to formalize the synagogue as its safe haven in times of evacuation. Claire Horowitz, the shul's director of financial development, said that Beth Emeth has always been known as a leader in the community, "and this cements our role."

A BAYBRIDGE SENIOR LIVING COMMUNITY

Holocaust Education Week:

Number of key anniversaries marked this year

Ron Csillag
Special to The CJN

The theme of this year's Holocaust Education Week, to run Nov. 3 to 9, is "national narratives." If the world-renowned series of programs, speakers and cultural events wanted to add a line, it would be "before it's too late."

The 33rd annual HEW will explore, as its website explains, "different national, generational and cultural narratives of the Holocaust and its aftermath... the personal and collective narratives of individual survivors and communities who rebuilt themselves elsewhere in the world."

To that end, the program will feature at least a dozen sessions of direct conversations with individual Holocaust survivors, and others highlighting first-hand accounts and testimonies.

"One Story at a Time," the opening night program on Nov. 3 at the CNE's Queen Elizabeth Theatre, co-sponsored by the Azrieli Foundation, will see the release of five new survivors' memoirs published by the foundation's Holocaust Survivor Memoirs Program, and the screening of five accompanying short films.

This year's HEW "is about giving voice to the survivors," program co-chair Joyce Rifkind told The CJN. Why now?

"Survivors are aging and dying," she said. "We wanted to give an opportunity to focus on them and their stories while we still have them."

The program also takes note of Canada's chairmanship of the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance, an intergovernmental body comprising state officials and experts from 31 countries. It supports Holocaust education, remembrance and research. Canada is chairing the IHRA in 2013–2014.

This year also marks the 70th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising and the 75th anniversary of Kristallnacht, the nationwide Nazi pogrom against prewar German Jews. Both will be commemorated in the closing program on Nov. 9 at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, with a candlelighting service to mark the milestone of Kristallnacht, which happened Nov. 9-10, 1938.

Also observing an important anniversary is None is Too Many, the groundbreaking book by professors Irving Abella and Harold Troper that chronicled Canada's dismal war-era record of admitting – or more like not admitting – Jewish refugees fleeing Europe.

Marking 30 years since the book's publication, HEW offers two programs with Troper (who is serving as the week's scholar-in-residence): On Nov. 4 at Beth Tzedec Congregation, he'll lead a discussion on his latest research: the Canadian Jewish community's failure to move the 1936 Nazi Olympic Games from Berlin, and its attempted boycott of the event.

And on Nov. 5 at Ryerson University's Heaslip House, Troper will appear on a panel alongside Jacqueline Celemencki (HEW's educator-in-residence) and Rochelle Rubinstein (its artist-in-residence) to discuss "Holocaust Legacies: The Canadian Connection." The program will examine how we understand the historical significance of the Holocaust in a modern context.

HEW's central theme – the individual's narrative – is "an incredibly important resource for historians," Troper told The CJN. But – and it's a touchy point – how accurate are survivors' memories? How do they stack up against the hard historical record?

"This is a major discussion point among historians," Troper replied, and he supplied a few questions of his own: "Is a survivor's testimony enough? Should we also, as historians, try to reach out and gather testimony, not just of survivors, but of bystanders, perpetrators... all those who had some direct connection to the events?"

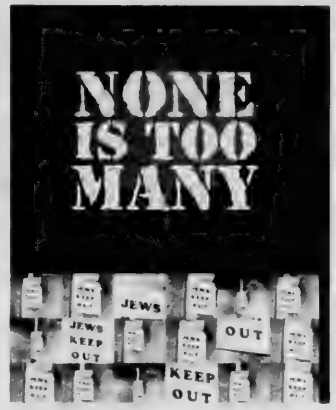
He has still more questions: What is the impact of the intervening years? How does memory change? Does it become selective? "And of course," Troper adds, "how much do you balance the memories against the kind of traditional historical record that historians are used to?"

Ultimately, he relies "a lot" on oral or memory history, "but always with a full awareness that it is only one source. But it's an incredibly important source, because, while the testimony that a survivor gives us may be short on peripheral vision – they may have not known what was going on in the neighbouring town or inner sanctums of the Nazi machine – they can give us historians all of a kind of intimate knowledge of what the human experience was like.

"It gives a picture or understanding of things we won't get any other way."

One session, on Nov. 5 at Shaar Shalom Synagogue, will examine a new development that has jarred survivors and Holocaust academics alike.

Last March, the New York Times, in a story headlined "The Holocaust just got more shocking," reported on the results of research by the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum, which 13 years earlier, began tabulating all the ghettos, slave-labour sites, concentration camps and killing factories that the Nazis had set up throughout Europe.



HEW marks 30th anniversary of the publication of None is Too Many.

The reality was much worse than anything imagined.

The study found there were more than 42,500 Nazi ghettos and camps throughout Europe from 1933 to 1945. Among those were 30,000 slave-labour camps; 1,150 Jewish ghettos; 980 concentration camps; 1,000 prisoner of war camps; 500 brothels filled with sex slaves; thousands of other transit and re-education camps, and centres for euthanizing the elderly and infirm, performing forced abortions or transporting victims to their deaths.

The overall figure of 42,500 ghettos and camps was "so staggering," the Times reported, "that even Holocaust scholars had to make sure they had heard [them] correctly." The story quoted one scholar as saying: "The numbers are so much higher than what we originally thought. We knew before how horrible life in the camps and ghettos was, but the numbers are unbelievable."

Historian Robert Jan van Pelt of the University of Waterloo and University of Toronto will examine the research and provide some of his own at the program, which starts at 8 p.m.

Troper said he's not surprised at the new research unearthed 70 years after the fact. After all, he said, summoning an old nugget about the Third Reich's fanatical record-keeping: "The Nazis committed genocide in triplicate."

Shuls supplement classes with online lessons

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

For many families, between school, extracurricular activities, their social lives – not to mention parents' busy schedules – it can be hard to fit supplementary Jewish studies into their lives.

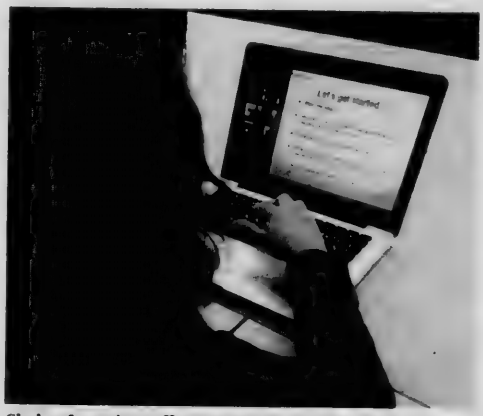
Starting this year, two Canadian synagogues are hoping to offer a more flexible option with the introduction of a program that partners with ShalomLearning, an American company that provides a system of online education.

Although the program has existed in the United States for two years, this is the first time the company has targeted a Canadian audience.

"We're reaching out globally," said Sarah Steinberg, CEO of ShalomLearning. The former executive vice-provost of Johns Hopkins University said she spent years focusing on online education, examining the differences between online and in-person studies.

The learning outcomes have proven to be identical, if not better in secular studies, she said.

"In some cases [the results are] better when you're learning online, because you have the advantage of being able to slow down a recording or take an extra time to look at something again," she said.



ShalomLearning offers online lessons for Hebrew and Torah study.

She said although she isn't aware of any studies focusing on faith-based education, "I have no reason to doubt that the findings are exactly the same."

Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto added the program this year for congregational school students learning Hebrew in grades 4 and up.

Daniel Silverman, the shul's director of education and family programming, said the school is hoping it will make it easier for students to take the class, despite their busy schedules.

For a number of years, the school has offered an option of having teachers come to students' homes if they couldn't make it to class, but this meant the teachers were driving to several houses a week.

Now with the online option, the teachers can teach two online classes, cutting down on the number of in-home tutorials.

"It's really amazing that basically you're running the same sort of class," Silverman said. "It may even be a little more interesting to the students, to students who are tech-savvy and like to have that relationship through the computer."

In Montreal, Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom also began using the program this year for its Grade 7 bar and bat mitzvah class. Like Beth Tzedec, the online lessons at the temple are only one component of the class.

Ali Maislin teaches both in class and online at that synagogue, and she said that so far, the two are not so different.

"We're all online together. We can all see each other. In that sense it's like sitting together," she said.

The biggest hurdle for her was learning the system and finding ways to help students who might have technical difficulties while trying not to let it affect the other students. But she noted that multitasking is a big part of teaching in the classroom, too.

Theoretically, if synagogues were to expand their online course offerings, it could offer the opportunity for Torah study to people who don't have a synagogue in their city, Steinberg said.

But there's still a while to go before the shuls are ready to tackle that audience.

Rabbi Lisa Grushcow, the temple's spiritual leader, said that although the classes enrich the program, she's adamant that the online classes could never replace in-class instruction.

"It's all a balancing act. You want to have an open door, and sometimes that means flexibility and accommodating where you can, but you want there to be substance, and part of the substance is community," she said.

CHAT teacher wins award for tech innovation

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The world-renowned TED organization, which promotes "ideas worth spreading," has recognized a Jewish Toronto high school teacher for successfully implementing a revolutionary teaching approach in his classroom.

Jamie Cohen, a Grade 9 English teacher at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Vaughan campus, is one of three teachers – and the only Canadian – to win an international contest that challenged educators to create a SOLE, a self-organized learning environment.

The SOLE Challenge, created earlier this year by a U.K.-based educational technology professor who received $1 million in seed money from TED to create a virtual "School in the Cloud," called on educators to create a learning environment that relies on the use of technology, collaboration and encouragement as the basis for 21st-century learning.

"It takes students on an intellectual journey to investigate the big questions," 39-year-old Cohen said.

"What I like about SOLE is that I can structure the class so that hands-on learners, auditory learners, and visual learners are all stimulated and engaged."

Cohen, who has a background in filmmaking and spent years in New York working for Saturday Night Live creator Lorne Michaels, said the contest appealed to him because of his interest in the way media can be used to teach universal lessons.

Cohen based his SOLE on a novel study of Hermann Hesse's Siddhartha, which follows a young man on a spiritual journey of self-discovery during the time of the Gautama Buddha, in the 6th century BCE.

His students were asked to access a digital version of the novel on Rap Genius, a website that allows students to analyze, discuss and annotate the text line by line.

The students could post questions, make comments on the text, and expand on another student's question or explanation of a passage, which encouraged collaborative online discussions.

"The students were asked to complete specific tasks, such as ask a question in an area you don't understand, or find a visual link of what India looked like in that region," Cohen explained.

The Rap Genius website also allows students to send questions directly to Cohen as they studied the chapters.

"Once they'd complete the tasks for each chapter... I would collect all the [students'] questions from Chapter 1, I would go to the tech room... and answer their questions on film. Instead of spending class time answering fact-based questions, I would answer the questions in front of a green screen, with the Taj Mahal in the background, and I would post the video that night and embed it into the online chapter," Cohen explained.

"I did that for every chapter. I either answered the questions through video or a podcast."

A SOLE is meant to encourage students to do their own investigation. Cohen said the teachers take on more of a facilitating role, rather than one that can be compared to "a guru on stage."

A SOLE also allows students to benefit from international guest speakers through Skype or Google Chat.

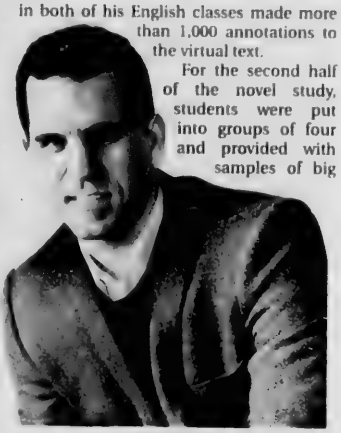
"You don't always need an expert in the room. In today's world, you can talk to someone in Israel or India," he said.

When Cohen first introduced his SOLE to his students last year, he was met with some resistance.

"This website, Rap Genius, is only two years old and it's the big new thing in education, and I was one of the first to do this using a novel," he said.

"I think at the beginning, it was so different, that one of my challenges was explaining why we were doing it this way."

But by the end of the unit, the 42 students in both of his English classes made more than 1,000 annotations to the virtual text.



Jamie Cohen

For the second half of the novel study, students were put into groups of four and provided with samples of big questions (such as, "What is a leader?") from the SOLE toolkit.

Each group was asked to come up with their own big question, investigate it using online resources and guidance from mentors, before discussing their findings with the other groups in the class. Cohen said when he conducted a survey for the students who took part in the SOLE, about 90 per cent of the students said the new approach made the novel study less boring and more meaningful.

"The feedback was amazing," he said, adding that his ultimate goal is to help change the way information is presented to students in a traditional school setting.

"I feel like the SOLE has revolutionized my approach in creating a student-driven, 21st-century learning environment that reaches all learning styles in class," he said.

Cohen and the other SOLE Challenge winners will be flown to New Orleans on Nov. 15 for the 2013 TED Youth Conference, where he will be presented with an award for his project.

Canada asked to maintain pressure on Iran

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Yuval Steinitz, Israel's minister of strategic affairs, visited Canada last week bearing a message: don't let up on Iran. "Strong pressure will [boost] the chances for diplomacy," said a spokesperson from the Israeli embassy in Ottawa.

Steinitz met with Prime Minister Stephen Harper and Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird before shuttling to Washington, D.C., where he participated in "strategic dialogue" with American and Israeli defence and intelligence experts, including Vice-President Joe Biden, the embassy spokesman said.

The U.S. meetings had long been scheduled, and the side trip to meet Canadian officials "shows you how close the relations are.

"The fact he met the prime minister even briefly is a sign of the warmth of the relationship," the embassy source said.

Israel considers Canada among its strongest allies and a respected power whose voice is heard in western capitals.

Iran is currently in talks over its nuclear program with the P5+1 group, which includes the United States, Britain, France, Russia, China and Germany. Iran wants to see crippling economic sanctions eased, while its interlocutors are concerned about its nuclear weapons program.

During his visit, Steinitz told reporters "the greater the pressure, the greater the chances for diplomacy to succeed."

"He wants Canada to continue support to ensure that the international community maintains the sanctions and keeps strong pressure on Iran," said the embassy spokesperson.

Any negotiated solution "has to be the right deal, where Iran does not have the capacity to create nuclear weapons," the spokesperson said.

Following the talks with Steinitz, Foreign Affairs issued a statement saying Baird's meeting was "to discuss the ongoing Middle East peace process, reinforce Canada's excellent relations with Israel and discuss the situations in Syria and Iran.

"Canada's strong and multifaceted relationship with Israel is based on shared values, common interests and strong political and social ties between the two countries."

A HOLOCAUST EDUCATION WEEK EVENT

Reena is hosting an event for the 33rd anniversary of Holocaust Education Week on Nov.7, 2013 at our new Reena Community Residence Building and site of our Holocaust Education Centre and the Maxwell and Ruth Leroy Holocaust Remembrance Garden.

"Euthanasia: The First Victims"

This presentation will focus on the extermination of over 200,000 persons with disabilities who were among the first victims of the so-called "Euthanasia" program during the Holocaust. Dr. Beth Griech-Polelle will discuss the rise of the Eugenics Movement; provide historical information on the T-4 program, criteria and process used to determine who was deemed "inferior."

The lecture will examine how communities were manipulated through propaganda to believe that people with mental and developmental disabilities should be seen as "life unworthy of living." The presenter will also talk about those who spoke out against the atrocities.

Dr. Beth A. Griech-Polelle is Associate Professor (PhD, Rutgers, 1999) and Undergraduate Advisor in the Department of History, Bowling Green State University, Ohio. Dr. Griech-Polelle researches and teaches modern German history, modern European women's history, and the history of antisemitism and the Holocaust. She has developed such courses as "Women and the Nazis," "The History of Antisemitism and the Holocaust," and "Nazi Policy History."

First store opened in 1937 in Kensington

Altogether catering and wholesale accounts for half the business.

The store is not losing money. "We're not locking and walking," said Joel, adding it's unclear how much longer the store will be open for business.

Retail sales are still important, but the business is so demanding that they don't have time to grow the wholesale and catering aspects of the company, they said.

Working in a cash business means they have to be at the store for long stretches at a time.

"I started today at 5:30 a.m. and will go to 1 or 1:30. That's a half day," said Joel. Stephen also started at 5:30 and will go to 7 p.m., and the next day, the shifts will be reversed, with him working the long day, Joel said.

At their ages – Stephen is 54, Joel is 58 – they don't want to put in the time anymore.

"We find we're both getting older. It's hard to work the hours," Joel said.

The sale of the building will mark the end of a family retail business that traces its roots back generations.

The Daiters' grandfather, Harry, opened the first store in 1937 in Kensington Market. A graduate of the agriculture program at what's now the University of Guelph, he started out renting a dairy and producing his own cheeses. He sold them out of a baby carriage, but that enterprise was closed down by provincial authorities. He then opened Kensington Creamery, selling the cheeses he had manufactured.

Daiter's is still known for its Lana Brand Cheeses, made in small batches without fillers or preservatives, in the traditional European style.

In 1959, Joel's and Stephen's father, Ron, moved the family to Bathurst Manor, which was then largely farmland. Seeing a large Jewish population north of Lawrence, he opened a store at 3519 Bathurst, where Tov-Li is now located, just down the street from Daiter's current location.

Joel began working in the store at age nine, storing items and packing customers' parcels.

The brothers learned the business from the ground up. Their mother, Rene, was also an important fixture in the family enterprise. She could be found in the kitchen, adapting family recipes for such items as gefilte fish from 12 portions to 300. "She had to tweak it," said Joel.

The business continued to grow and in 1964 Ron Daiter, Joel and Stephen's father, acquired the current property at 3535 Bathurst Street, which includes a parking lot in the back. At one point, Daiter's boasted eight retail locations, but without the hands-on presence of family members, service was not up to their standards, the brothers stated.

"Nobody is like an owner," Joel said.

What will follow at 3535 Bathurst, the brothers can't say. Addressing those customers, who no doubt will miss the traditional items available at the store and the "Cheers-like" atmosphere, where shmoozing is part of the shopping experience, Stephen said: "Nothing is around forever. Everything has its time."

A Bathurst Street institution will soon be coming to an end.

Islamophobia is the 'elephant in the room'

Muslims real target of charter, law prof says

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Muslims are the real target of the proposed charter of Quebec values, while kippot and turbans are "collateral damage" in the provincial government's plan to eliminate religious symbols from the public service, a McGill University law professor says.

Speaking Oct. 20 at a panel discussion on the issue at Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom, Daniel Weinstock said Islamophobia is "the elephant in the room" in the push to secularize Quebec.

"We are not at the centre [of this debate], but as Jews, according to our ethical tradition, we have to stand up resolutely for our Muslim brothers and sisters," Weinstock said, receiving widespread applause.

Weinstock, who was an adviser to the Bouchard-Taylor commission on reasonable accommodation and until 2012 was head of the Université de Montréal's Research Centre on Ethics for many years, said the charter is "a response to a problem that does not exist and has no sign of becoming one in the near future" – and "a fairly extreme" response at that.

Weinstock is optimistic the charter will not go forward. He sees "deep fissures" starting to appear among its three main proponents: "laïcité [church-state separation] perfectionists," who not only want the state to be neutral, but to help everyone get over religion; feminists, and nationalists who think the sovereignty movement has become too inclusive.

If the charter, as now envisioned, did become law, Weinstock thinks it would not "pass constitutional scrutiny."

"The government is playing a dangerous electoral game," he said. "I think it may be underestimating how much Quebecers are attached to the values in the charters, both federal and Quebec's own. I think they are more sensitive to these issues than the government gives them credit for."

Fellow panelist Leila Bedeir, of the Collective des féministes musulmanes du Québec, concurred: "Let's call a spade a spade. It's Islamophobia," and in particular a fear of visible Muslim women.

The Vanier College teacher, who was not wearing a hijab, said the government has "hijacked the equality of the sexes for its political goals."

"Muslim women have become the principle threat to the secular nature of Quebec society, to the nation," she said, and the target of fear of a community that has rapidly grown to more than 200,000 people, an increase of 500 per cent in 20 years.

She deplored that certain feminists support a "paternalistic" attitude on the part of the government, while condemning it in the Muslim tradition.

Muslim women wear head scarves "for as many reasons as there are women: religious, cultural, familial," Bedeir said. Although there is a "strong recommendation" that they do so from religious authorities, "it's a discussion that's been going on for 1,400 years."

"If the bill passes or not, the damage is done," she said. "Those who are different will not feel like an integral part of society unless they erase everything about themselves and assimilate."

But, it's a double-edged sword, Bedeir suggested. Muslims like herself who are not visible and are engaged in public life are "accused of being infiltrators, of trying to Islamicize institutions, of pushing a pro-hijab agenda."

To be labelled an Islamist, as she has been, certainly discourages civic involvement at the very least and can be ruinous, said Bedeir.

The temple's Rabbi Lisa Grushcow commented that the event's organizers, indeed, "had to scramble" to find a Muslim representative for the panel.

Weinstock added that the 2008 Bouchard-Taylor recommendation that people representing state authority such as judges and police officers should not be allowed to wear religious symbols – a compromise echoed by former PQ premiers Jacques Parizeau and Lucien Bouchard – is not the answer either.

This middle ground is itself a curtailment of individual rights and must be justified to be overridden, he said.

Considerable time was given to commentary from the near-capacity audience. One of the most affecting remarks was from a woman who described herself as the daughter of Holocaust survivors who was born in Poland and has been living here since early childhood.

"I'm frightened, even if the bill is not passed. What will the ripple effect be?... Will there be violence?"

Alice Herscovitch, executive director of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre (MHMC), a co-organizer of the event, responded that, "This is not the Holocaust. There is no persecution, but there is a real anxiety among people who were identified as Jews in Europe and North Africa, and died for it. There is a fear of being seen as the other, of new stereotypes about the differences of being a Jew here."

Other panelists were Micheline Milot, a Université du Québec à Montréal sociology professor and author of Laïcité sans frontiers, who argued that the French model of secularism is not applicable in North America; Mukhbir Singh, a vice-president for Quebec of the World Sikh Organization, who said the turban is an essential part of an observant Sikh's attire; Father John Walsh, a Catholic priest who noted that he has not worn a clerical collar for 45 years, but nevertheless opposes restrictions on fundamental rights, and Victor Goldbloom, past president of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, and a former Quebec cabinet minister, who said public servants' attire must remain a personal choice.

The latter two men have spent decades in interfaith dialogue and pleaded for people to make a greater effort to understand those of different beliefs and customs.

The discussion was moderated by McGill law professor Shauna Van Praagh, and closed with remarks by Rev. Diane Rollert, minister of the Unitarian Church of Montreal.

The event was held in collaboration with the McGill Centre for Human Rights and Legal Pluralism, Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Montreal, and the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, as well as the MHMC.

'Jewish' orchestra plays Wagner

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A "Jewish" orchestra from Germany devoted to reviving the music of composers who were victims of the Holocaust makes its Canadian premiere – and plays Wagner.

"I like to provoke people," said Daniel Grossmann, founder, artistic director and conductor of the Jakobsplatz Orchestra, based in Munich, where he was born in 1978.

Jakobsplatz gave a concert at the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts' Bourgie Hall on Oct. 23 to a sold-out audience, the last stop on the chamber orchestra's first North American tour. It had earlier performed at colleges in Maine and Kansas, and at New York's Symphony Space on the Upper West Side.

Daniel Grossman

At the first three venues, the youthful orchestra drew from its signature repertoire: classical pieces by Erwin Schulhoff and Gideon Klein, both brilliant Czech composers who died in the camps, as well as earlier Jewish greats such as Mendelssohn and Mahler.

Grossmann, the son of Hungarian immigrants and grandson of Holocaust survivors, changed the program in Montreal at the request of the museum, he said, but he also welcomed the chance to play Wagner.

The museum's current exhibition Splendore a Venezia celebrates the golden age of the city-state in art and music. Venice led Grossman to think of Richard Wagner, whom he loathes as a person, but whose music he adores.

Wagner lived in Venice for some years and died there, and this year is the 200th anniversary of his birth.

Playing Wagner is something Grossman and his orchestra, which he founded in 2005, cannot do in Germany, and that irks him.

The day before the concert, Grossman appeared at a public talk on the state of Jewish culture in Germany today with Concordia University anthropology and history professor Erica Lehrer, an expert in the renewed interest in Jewish culture in Europe.

Grossmann disclosed that three days earlier, his request to play Wagner at the Munich Jewish Community Centre, where the orchestra is based, was turned down, even though he had proposed including quotes from the composer's anti-Semitic pamphlets in the program.

The orchestra is independent from the centre, he added later. (Jakobsplatz is the name of the centrally located public square in Munich where the centre opened in 2006.)

Grossmann believes the interdiction is misguided, and, at least partly, based on the German Jewish community's solidarity with Israel, where there is an understanding that Wagner not be performed.

He feels that playing Wagner provokes audiences – and almost all of his orchestra's listeners are non-Jews – "to think about the person of Wagner" and his contradictions. Grossmann agrees that Wagner the man was more than a hater of Jews – his writing "maybe was the starting point of Hitler…"

"I love his music, but on the other hand, he was a horrible man. People say they hate his music, but I don't believe them," Grossmann said.

"I understand they have bad feelings, but it's not a solution to say the music was bad. He was a genius."

Backed many Orthodox institutions in Toronto

The ability of the Reichmann family to support the facility was compromised by the family's financial woes, but even afterward, their support contributed to more than half the institution's budget, the staffer said. Over the years, they gave "millions and millions of dollars" to the facility, which now boasts more than 40 full-time scholars and a few hundred who study part time or worship at the centre.

The kollel was not the only Toronto institution to benefit from Reichmann's support.

"Until [the bankruptcy], he was one of the main funders of Orthodox institutions [in Toronto]," said the staff person. Even when the family could no longer maintain the same level of funding, "he was the driving force behind it and he got other people behind it."

Reichmann was born in Vienna, the fifth of six children. His father, Samuel, was a successful businessman who had left Hungary in 1928.

According to Bianco, the family fled Austria after the German annexation in 1938, moving first to Paris and later to Morocco, where Samuel made "a second fortune" as a currency dealer.

As a young man, Paul devoted himself to studying Torah. According to Bloomberg News, from 1953 to 1956 he worked in Casablanca as educational director of Ozar Hatorah, which operated Orthodox schools.

He moved to Toronto in 1957. He expanded his brothers' import business, Olympia Floor & Wall Tile, and turned to real estate development.

Despite his success, Reichmann never forgot his roots. Their offices and businesses were closed on Saturdays as the Reichmann family remained committed to their Jewish heritage.

A memorial service attended by 1,000 people was held at the Bais Yaakov girls school on Saranac Boulevard, which he had supported. He was interred in Jerusalem. The funeral service "was very sad," the kollel staff person said. Reichmann's generosity affected many worthwhile charities. "There's almost no one who wasn't touched," he said.

Paul is survived by his wife, Lea, and five children, Vivian, Rachel, Libby, Barry and Henry.

$2-million centre adds to project

Today, the pebbles total more than five million, and Mikel anticipates hitting the six-million mark by June.

The pebbles are temporarily on display in the school's peace garden. The pair had intended to use them to create a memorial path, but now they have bigger plans.

"We started piling the pebbles... [but] our eyes have been open to the enormity of the project, and it has moved much farther beyond the school. It's turned into a community project, to a Canadian project, to a global project," Mikel said.

Since the project's launch, pebbles and letters from all over the world – from 58 countries, from each Canadian province and territory, and even from the sites of concentration camps, including Auschwitz-Birkenau, Majdanek and Bergen-Belsen – have been mailed in.

Marion Blumenthal, a Holocaust survivor and the author of Four Perfect Pebbles, as well as Canadian authors Robert Munsch and John Koning, have contributed pebbles to the project.

"We need to make it much more than a peace garden for the school. The school will never be separated from it, and it's a huge component of it, but because of the reaction, we're in the process of starting our own charitable organization, the Pebbles for Peace organization."

Through the charity, Mikel hopes to raise enough money, about $2 million, to build a memorial on the 50-acre school property, as well as a theatre to host human rights speakers, diversity conferences and film festivals.

"The goal is to build a Holocaust memorial that will commemorate the victims, that will celebrate the survivors, that will celebrate the righteous."

The pebbles will be moved from the school's peace garden to be displayed in the memorial.

Mikel said she hopes the memorial will open up the conversation to other human rights abuses.

"While the project started with the Holocaust, we all know that the violation of human rights didn't end with that, so within the school, we teach about genocide, about racism and all kinds of human rights issues, and we want to create a space where that discussion can continue outside of the school as well."

Mikel said the hope is that they'll be able to break ground for the memorial next spring, but she anticipates that it will take anywhere from five to 10 years to build both the memorial and the theatre.

"The children have really put their hearts into this," Goodwin said.

"When you see the smiles on their faces and you see what they have to say and the stories they tell, it's wonderful."

"One the parents of our graduates summed it up well," Mikel added.

"She said, 'We often talk about making a difference and we all have a voice, we can do it, but it's not very often that the kids actually get to see the difference that they're making and that's what the pebbles project has done.'"

Goodwin said the project is also about "believing in yourself, believing that each of us can make a difference and do something that can help this world."

In addition to incorporating Holocaust education into its curriculum, the Goodwin Learning Centre also hosts a Holocaust Education Week event every year.

On Nov. 7, Holocaust survivor Faigie Libman will share her story with the Trenton community, followed by a presentation by students about the latest plans for the pebble project.

Pay heed to kids' online activities, expert advises

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

One way to be a good parent in the digital age is to communicate with your children about what's happening online, says a renowned author, social worker and family therapist.

To do this, Joe Rich advised parents to "Go online... Become a user."

Rich was speaking Oct. 16 at the North York Civic Centre to some 100 parents at an evening exploring technology called "From Preschooler to Screen-ager."

The evening was hosted by the Ontario Council of Jewish Camps (OCJC), an umbrella body comprising 10 Jewish overnight camps and one day camp. The OCJC is supported by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Silber Family Centre for Jewish Camping.

Rich offered strategies to eager parents hoping to learn about today's quickly changing technological world.

"We are never aiming for perfect – we're only aiming for better," Rich said. "Perfect is a moving target. Let go of perfect. As soon as you move forward into better, you actually solicit the feelings of better and you need to feel good to parent in today's world."

He provided figures about Facebook to put the social media site in perspective for parents.

"Somewhere between 500 million and one billion people have Facebook, and over half of them log in every single day. There are one million active advertisers – individuals or corporations – who have placed an ad on Facebook in at least the last 28 days; 7.5 million children under the age of 13 [which is against Facebook policy] have a Facebook account; 7.4 million of their parents don't know. Five million children under the age of 10 have their own Facebook account. In 2011 600,000 accounts were compromised per day," he said.

"This wakes us up. Things are moving very quickly for all of us."

Another strategy to teach is self-regulation. Noting that the usual mentality among teens using social media is, "In my mind, on my tongue, send," Rich advised parents to have their children write a text, count to 10, read the text and decide if they still want to send it.

Rich also cautioned parents about privacy issues with social media.

"It is important for each parent to have his child sign a waiver that releases the child from any expectations of privacy. Kids don't like to hear that, but they need to hear it."

Rich also advised parents to try to create a tech-free zone in their homes and limit screen time, including TV.

"Kids on the computer are playing with an unlocked door – something to think about for their safety and our own," Rich said.

The OCJC's participating camps are URJ Camp George, Camp Gesher, Camp Kadimah, Camp Moshava, Camp Northland – B'nai Brith, Camp Ramah, Camp Shalom, Camp Shomria, Camp Solelim, J.Academy and the Jack and Pat Kay Centre Camp. Each camp had a table at the event, offering parents the opportunity to learn more about them.

Bryan Keshen, vice-president of emerging communities and Jewish camping at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, told The CJN that camp offers kids a break from technology.

"In today's world, where even our children are constantly connected... overnight camp is the rare time when connective technology is turned off, shut down, or left behind and campers can immerse themselves in the connectivity of friendships," Keshen said.

JNF PROM: The Jewish National Fund held a prom night for more than 250 people Oct. 19 at Toronto's Zero Gravity Circus to raise money for the Ilanot Special Education School in Jerusalem, a school for students aged six to 21 with severe motor and cognitive disabilities. Proceeds will go to renovating the school's yards to meet safety and accessibility standards. Honest Ed's sold to Vancouver developer

CJN Staff

After standing for 70 years at the corner of Bathurst and Bloor streets, Honest Ed's has been sold to Westbank Properties, a Vancouver-based luxury developer of homes, offices and hotels.

Honest Ed's owner, David Mirvish, son of the late Ed Mirvish, founder of the retail discount store and Ed's wife, Anne, said the deal will close later this year.

The store sits on a 1.8-hectare parcel of land, which includes the nearby Mirvish Village, known for its art galleries, restaurants and stores.

Mirvish said the iconic store will remain open for at least two more years, because the developer will be renting the properties back to him for the next two to three years while it decides how to develop the land.

He told the Toronto Star that Westbank is not in a rush to develop the land and that it has no concrete plans yet.

"I think they want to listen as much as anything else. They have some basic thoughts about it, but they need as wide open a slate as possible to draw the best conclusions," Mirvish said.

"[The company] has a wonderful history and track record. I think they want to be part of our community and make a contribution to it. I think it will honour my parents."

Mark Mietklewicz

Rabbis have long grappled with how to apply Halachah to modern situations. But sometimes questions come along that may make our scholars scratch their heads. Today, a look at some Jewish digital conundrums and possible solutions.

Please remember that any rulings should be discussed with an authority who is well versed on the situation and the halachic issues involved.

If you like rabbis who get to the point, then you'll love Rabbi Shlomo Aviner. His tweet-length responses address a wide variety of halachic queries, including tech-related ones. A sampling:

Q: Is it permissible to try on shoes in a store to know the right size so that I can order them on the Internet?

A: You should ask permission in the store.

Q: Is it possible to sell chametz over the Internet?

A: Yes. It's a form of appointing an agent.

Q: Is it permissible to download things from the Internet for free when they're for sale elsewhere?

A: It's forbidden because of copyright laws.

In fairness, the rabbi does address some topics at length such as the previous question in an essay titled, "Don't Copy!" [http://bit.ly/jdigital2]

Many of the contemporary questions at Yeshiva.org.il focus on the Internet. For example, if it's not Shabbat where you live, can you check out a website that's located where it is the day of rest? The response: it depends. If the website is automated and isn't staffed by Jews, there's no problem. However, if you're benefitting from the efforts of Jews who are working on Shabbat, you should stay clear. Check out Yeshiva.org.il for its take on webcams, downloads and online financial transactions which take place on Shabbat. [http://bit.ly/jdigital1]

Judaism has an ancient tradition of valuing prayer while in a minyan or quorum. But if you find yourself alone, can you have a virtual minyan online with other worshippers all praying simultaneously? The Ohr Somayach rabbi quotes from the Shulchan Aruch, a 16th-century codification of Jewish law: "We require that all 10 be in one place and the shliach tzibbur [the chazzan] must be with them." So if you want to be counted, you've got to show up. However, the rabbi mentions that if due to extenuating circumstances someone isn't able to attend an "already-existing minyan," there is an established tradition of attempting to pray at the same time as the group. The lone worshipper could take advantage of technology to align himself with a local congregation. [http://bit.ly/jdigital11]

Mi Yodeya (Who Knows) is a clearinghouse for discussion and debate about the intersection between Halachah and technology. The answers aren't definitive, and the back-and-forth arguments about 21st-century issues seem reminiscent of traditional Jewish disputations. Here are some of the topics being discussed:

- If your neighbour has Wi-Fi, can you connect into it? Is there an issue of stealing?
- Is participating on a teacher rating site a violation of lashon hara (derogatory speech)?
- If a corporation responds to your complaint, can you publish its response online?
- Can you Skype/phone/text your future spouse during the week before the wedding when you're not supposed to see each other face to face? [http://bit.ly/jdigital4]

We must study and live our heritage

Sephardi Window
Rabbi Ilan Acoca

I've been alarmed by three recent events that I'd like to share with you.

First, on Erev Yom Kippur, I met an elderly gentleman visiting Vancouver from Australia. At the breakfast table after Shacharit, this man of Persian background spoke nostalgically about his past. He shared some moments of his childhood, remembering how an Iraqi blind man whom he accompanied to the synagogue every day in Mumbai taught him Sephardi prayers and tradition. When asked about the current Sephardi congregation in Australia, he responded sadly that it was a dying community. With a beautiful voice, he led us in the Birkat Hamazon, and I couldn't help but imagine being in the desert of my ancestors. His voice had an authenticity that connected all of us to our rich past.

Second, a few weeks later, I read staggering news from a recently published Pew Research Center study of U.S. Jews. Let me share with you a few of the key findings:

- The intermarriage rate has reached a high of 58 per cent for all Jews marrying between 2000 and 2013, and 71 per cent for non-Orthodox Jews – a huge change from before 1970, when only 17 per cent of Jews married outside the faith.
- Two-thirds of Jews don't belong to a synagogue, one-fourth don't believe in God and one-third had a Christmas tree in their home last year.
- The study identifies a growing number, defined loosely as of Jewish ancestry, who now consider themselves people of no religion. This group currently constitutes nearly a quarter of the adult Jewish population.

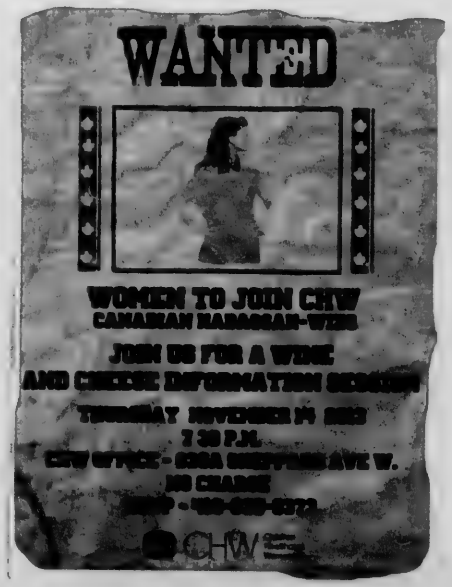
Third, a few days after the Pew study appeared, all of us were shocked to hear of the passing of Rabbi Ovadia Yosef. His departure is a great loss for all of Am Yisrael. Among the many, many contributions this man made to Am Yisrael were his innovative halachic rulings, his role in restoring the pride of the Sephardi world, his reasoned, halachic permission for thousands of agunot to marry, and his decision that Jewish Ethiopians are, indeed, full-fledged Jews.

The imminent disappearance of a synagogue in Australia, the unhappy demographics in America (a soon-to-be published study will show roughly the same trends in Canada), and the painful loss of one of our generation's gedolim – what connects these three unfortunate events?

At once, we should understand that throughout the millennia, we have been confronted by numerous challenges that have required Jewish creativity and perseverance. Why should our generation be any different?

Education, as always, is the key to Jewish continuity. There's simply no substitute for study and the ensuing excitement of learning about our history and truly living our heritage – parents and children alike. It begins at home and carries on through formal education at our synagogues and schools. Yet, nothing can take the place of living our Judaism – through ritual, and unending questions and responses – at home. Historically, this provides fertile ground for the effective transmission of Judaism.

Put another way, my mother learned to salt meat, thus making it kosher, at home from her mother, and her mother learned this from her grandmother. This, in effect, is how we have endured – and shall endure – baruch HaShem – from generation to generation.



Being an outsider on the High Holidays

Class Act
Daniel Held

Growing up as a regular shul-goer, I have always felt as though the High Holidays are an extension of the rest of the year. I went to the same shul, sat in the same seat, saw the same familiar faces and listened to the same rabbi. Comfortable in the environment, the liturgy and the service, I couldn't conceive what it was like for the hundreds who were not regulars.

This year, my family and I arrived in Jerusalem a week before Rosh Hashanah. Deciding among synagogues is a challenge in any large community, especially in Jerusalem, where the options are virtually endless. So we did what any modern family would do, we crowdsourced – posting a message on Facebook looking for suggestions.

Our main priority was a kid-friendly synagogue. Last Rosh Hashanah our daughter was barely six months old. She spent most of the service bundled up in a baby carrier napping, eating and listening to the melodies of tfillah. This year, with an energetic toddler who claps and dances to Shabbat morning tffilot, who steals others' snacks, and who generally scurries around shul, we knew our needs would be different.

One shul percolated to the top of our crowdsourcing. We had heard of the shul, its reputation for a dynamic rabbi, a warm community, quality children's programming and a good kiddush. We bought tickets.

The High Holidays are an opportunity for synagogues to shine and reach beyond their regular attendees, but they are also the most challenging times on the synagogue's schedule. Expectations are raised, staff are pulled in multiple directions, the building operates at – and even beyond – capacity, and an influx of new people puts demands on the services provided by the synagogue.

Our experience on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur didn't live up to expectations.

The children's programming was poor – at best. The space where the children's services usually take place was usurped by an overflow adult service. Instead, a pair of teenagers were responsible for supervising children in the playground outside. The sanctuary was so crowded that there was no room for our daughter to sit with us – even during the short periods she was quiet. With so many new faces, the rabbi and congregants didn't display the warmth and welcome we had been told to expect. Only a few of those sitting beside us – for many hours of services – introduced themselves and welcomed us. The sense of warmth for which the synagogue is known was hardly apparent.

Judging by the strong recommendations, I am convinced that on a regular Shabbat, the synagogue is warm, welcoming and has stellar youth programming. But on the days we attended, the shul fell victim to the particular challenges of the High Holidays.

In the two months since Rosh Hashanah, we've been to many Jerusalem synagogues but haven't been back to the shul we went to on the High Holidays.

I'm not used to being an outsider in synagogue. For regular services, I feel comfortable in both my regular shul and new synagogues. Being an outsider on Rosh Hashanah, however, taught me important lessons about the particular challenges and opportunities of the High Holidays.

Faith in this eternal people

From the Bimah
Rabbi Yael Splansky

The 20th-century French essayist, Edmond Fleg, recalls the biblical Abraham and writes: "And I say to myself: from this remote ancestor right down to my own parents, all these ancestors have handed me a truth which flowed in their blood, which now flows in mine. Shall I not hand it on, with my blood, to those of my blood?

"And I say to you: Will you take it from me, my child? Will you hand it on? Perhaps you will wish to abandon it. If so, let it be for a greater truth, if there is one. I shall not blame you. It will be my fault; I shall have failed to hand it on as I received it. But of this I am sure: whether you abandon it or whether you follow it, [the People] Israel will journey on to the end of days."

This is a kind of confession. Fleg may have lacked faith in himself and in his ability to inspire a Jewish life in his own children. Fleg may have lacked faith in his children to be open-minded enough to receive the profound and practical wisdom Judaism can provide. Fleg may have lacked faith in his children to be open-hearted enough to perceive the exquisite morality of Judaism. But he did not lack faith in the promise made to Abraham – he believed with perfect faith that the Jewish People is an eternal people.

When our patriarch entered into the covenant with God, he was promised progeny beyond his wildest dreams. God took him outside to the open desert sky by night and said: "Look toward heaven and count the stars, if you are able to count them... so shall be your descendants." (Genesis 15:5)

Shimon Ravidovitch may have referred to the Children of Israel as "the ever-dying people," but Fleg articulated a faith that is also verified by history. Come what may – pogrom, inquisition or Holocaust. Come what may – the tremendous blessings of acceptance, opportunity, freedom, and privilege. Come what may, the Jewish People will endure.

The flurry of worry since the release of the Pew report is not new. Jewish continuity has been our number 1 concern from the very beginning. When Abraham and Isaac climbed together to the peak of Moriah, tension was thick in the air. The unspoken question between that first Jewish parent and that first Jewish child was: "What will become of us? Good God, what will become of us?!" But they both survive, they both carry on somehow, and God reinforces the promise of "descendants as many as the stars in the sky." (Genesis 22:17)

These are the words we still long to hear. From here, the stars look tiny, but from the point of view of heaven, each one is a world unto itself. Around each descendant star an entire solar system might take shape. Abraham's descendants may be small in number, but Rabbi Chayim of Tzantz teaches that each one is burning with potential,each one is an indispensable part of God's plan for eternity. So let's have a little faith.

Bill to halt prisoner releases rejected

JTA

JERUSALEM — An Israeli government committee approved the release of Palestinian prisoners hours after another committee rejected a bill that would have prevented such releases as part of peace negotiations.

The bill, which was proposed by the Jewish Home party, was dismissed Sunday by the Ministerial Committee for Legislation.

Hours later, a ministerial panel led by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu approved a list of Palestinian prisoners scheduled to be released this week as part of the current revived Israeli-Palestinian peace talks.

Some 26 Palestinian prisoners were to be freed Tuesday in the second of four prisoner releases. In total, 104 Palestinians jailed for at least 20 years will be released; 26 prisoners were released in August.

All of the prisoners approved Sunday for release perpetrated offences before the Oslo accords of 1993, according to a statement released by the Prime Minister's Office. 21 are from the West Bank and five are from Gaza.

"It should be emphasized that any prisoner who resumes hostile activity will be returned to serve the remainder of his sentence," the statement said.

Announcements of new West Bank settlement housing construction reportedly were to coincide with the release in a bid to calm critics from the right.

Ministers of the Likud, Yesh Atid and Hatnuah parties voted against the bill, while ministers of Jewish Home and the Yisrael Beiteinu party, which is in partnership with Likud, voted for the bill.

The public had 48 hours to raise objections to the list of prisoners released and appeal to Israel's Supreme Court.

The Palestinian Authority reportedly was planning a reception ceremony for Tuesday night at its Muquata headquarters in Ramallah to greet the freed prisoners.

A relative hangs a banner depicting Palestinian prisoner Moses Qar'an outside his house in Ramallah Oct. 28. Israel was set to release 26 Palestinian prisoners earlier this week in the second stage of a deal brokered by the United States in July that brought about the resumption of peace talks. (Issam Rimawi/Flash90 photo)

Anti-Israel ads back in Boston

JTA

BOSTON — The Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority said it was restoring dozens of ads critical of Israel to its transit system that had been taken down following public complaints.

On Oct. 24, the transit system said the 80 ads would be put back in the Greater Boston area and that there had been a "miscommunication" with its advertising contractor Titan, according to the Boston Globe.

The ads, which went up Oct. 21, were removed several days later by Titan following the complaints.

"There was a breakdown in our established procedures for handling complaints about specific ads," a transit spokesperson said.

The ads consist of four maps that show what is called "Palestinian loss of land – 1946-2010." A message alongside the maps reads "4.7 million Palestinians are Classified by the UN as Refugees."

Connecticut resident Henry Clifford, chairman of the Committee for a Just Peace in Israel and Palestine, paid for the $40,000 campaign.

Similar ads are currently running in the Vancouver transit system, sponsored by a local anti-Israel group, while the Toronto Transit Commission has rejected such as ads as potentially anti-Semitic.

The pro-Israel group StandWithUs paid to have pro-Israel ads run in the Vancouver transit system to counter the anti-Israel ones.

Other ad campaigns with comparable ads have caused a stir in Washington, D.C., and New York, but the ads there were never removed.

Jewish rocker dies at age 71

JTA

Lou Reed

Musician and guitarist Lou Reed, the frontman for the band Velvet Underground as well as a solo artist, has died.

Reed, who was born to a Jewish family, died Sunday at 71. A cause of death was not made public.

He had a liver transplant last year after years of alcohol and drug abuse.

Reed reportedly was coy about his Jewish roots. He was quoted as saying, "My God is rock 'n' roll" and "The most important part of my religion is to play guitar."

Reed, born Lewis Allan Reed in Brooklyn, N.Y., became influential in rock by blending art and music in New York in the 1960s through the Velvet Underground's collaboration with pop artist Andy Warhol. The band was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1996.

Reed quit the band in 1970 and focused on his solo career, which featured the 1972 hit song Walk on the Wild Side, as well as other well-known songs such as Sweet Jane (originally recorded with the Velvet Underground) and 1989's Dirty Boulevard.

He visited Israel five years ago with his musician wife, Laurie Anderson, during her world tour.

U.S. Federation chiefs call for free preschool

JTA

NEW YORK — The leaders of the Jewish Federations of North America (JFNA) are calling for free Jewish preschool for every Jewish family in America.

In an op-ed published last week on the Huffington Post and in the Forward, JFNA CEO Jerry Silverman and board chair Michael Siegal said free Jewish preschool would "dramatically widen the pipeline of families entering Jewish life through this critical early gateway."

Ted Sokolsky

The idea was one of four offered by Silverman and Siegal to "intensify – and make affordable – the most effective vehicles for engaging people in Jewish life," they wrote.

The two also called for tripling the percentage of Jewish kids attending Jewish summer camps, to 30 per cent, more followup with alumni of Birthright Israel trips, and intensive investment in Jewish programming in parts of the country where Jewish density is high but Jewish engagement is low.

Asked in an interview with JTA if he has a road map to deliver free Jewish preschool to every Jewish family in America, Silverman said, "It's an idea. These are four concepts and ideas. Our goal is to unpack these, take a look at these, take a look at the models that are already out there and see what this idea could really turn into. And once we unpack it, we will be able to really see what is reasonable and what is executable. But we think it's in the right direction."

Ed Segalowitz, executive director of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Centre for Jewish Education, said he doesn't know if JFNA's plan to fund Jewish preschool includes Canadian families, but he is happy to discuss the possibility with Silverman.

"I'd love to find out what his vision is and would love to work with him and see what ideas he's got and how we could get there," Segalowitz said.

He said he doesn't yet have an idea of how much it would cost in Toronto to offer free Jewish preschool education to all Jewish families in Toronto.

But he did estimate that there are about 11,000 Jewish children between the ages of two and five in Toronto.

Considering that Jewish preschool tuition costs upwards of $13,000 a year, if every Jewish child took advantage of this initiative, it would cost about $140 million a year.

Ted Sokolsky, UJA Federation's president and CEO, said, "In order to do this they're going to have to acquire new sources of funding… a lot of it might come from private foundations, some of whom can't provide funding in Canada."

But he added that the idea is not about mitigating the high cost of Jewish education.

"This is an initiative to incentivize Jewish families, particularly Americans, to consider the Jewish day school system," Sokolsky said.

He said in Toronto, 36 per cent of Jewish families choose Jewish day school.

"American families don't even approach that… It's not about financial need, it's about incentivizing people – if you put your kids in Jewish day school, number 1, they get a great start, and two, the families get turned on to Jewish education."

A jump in enrolment might result from this initiative, which could lower the cost of Jewish education overall, he said.

"It's the last five or six kids in a class that can lower the cost for everyone. The cost of educating 23 kids in a class is the same cost as educating 28 kids in a class."

Sokolsky said there are currently about 1,400 kids in Jewish preschool programs in Toronto.

"As far as I know, Jewish daycares are at full capacity. If we wanted to increase [enrolment] by 50 per cent, there are no spaces, so you'd need huge capital investment to get that."

Segalowitz said it's too premature to talk seriously about numbers.

"We'd have to talk, sit down… [and talk about] what it would mean to offer it on a free basis to all children… There is a lot of research that would need to be done on that," he said. "It's a concept, an idea, and one well-worth pursuing."

The op-ed outlining Silverman and Siegal's ideas offered little in the way of specifics. On Birthright followup, the two authors issued a call for Birthright's "gatekeepers to share this vast database of alumni contacts with us so that we have a mechanism to engage them in Jewish life."

On the subject of Jewish camp, Silverman did not identify a particular strategy for increasing enrolment, but told JTA that the Foundation for Jewish Camp, which he led for five years before he assumed the helm of the Jewish Federations, is working on a number of strategies for increasing market demand for Jewish camps.

On the subject of dense Jewish communities with low Jewish engagement – Silverman cited Denver, San Diego and Phoenix – the op-ed called for "Jewish Development Zones" that would develop the free Jewish preschool model, build an excellent Jewish summer camp, support existing Jewish youth programming, and develop programs for Birthright alumni and young Jewish singles.

Ontario minister in Israel on trade mission

Viva Sarah Press
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — Eric Hoskins, Ontario's economic development, trade and employment minister, was in Israel last week on a multipurpose trade mission that included attending the prestigious Water Technology and Environmental Control Exhibition and Conference (WATEC) Israel 2013.

WATEC is a leading event for the global water industry that brings together international business and government leaders to discuss water solutions and showcase technological advancements.

"The world is here, 14,000 delegates at WATEC," Hoskins told The CJN as to why it was important for him to bring a trade mission to the Tel Aviv conference.

"Israel and Canada are great friends, so I'm here to build on that friendship and translate it into even more co-operation and trade and looking for opportunities to collaborate."

Israel may be a country of little water, but its water technology sector is among the world's best.

"Israel has a world-class water and waste water sector and in Ontario, one of our strongest emerging sectors is water. We refer to it as the blue economy. So it's a natural area for co-operation," Hoskins told The CJN in his last media interview before returning to Toronto.

Eric Hoskins speaking at Mekorot. [Sasson Tiram Photography]

While Hoskins had great praise for Israel's water and waste-water technologies, his real message was that together with Ontario's water technology prowess, Canada and Israel could combine forces and help other countries in need.

"I know Mekorot [Israel's national water company] and Ontario share this vision to help other countries. We have opportunities to join forces to provide water solutions to countries that need water. No one country can solve this for the world, so we have to come together," he said.

Real Tech, an award-winning Canadian company that has developed a product line of portable and real-time water quality analyzers and Israel's national water company, Mekorot, offer one example of shared technologies.

Utilizing Real Tech's innovative, yet cost effective, continuous spectrum analyzers combined with the statistical analysis capabilities of Mekorot's water quality and models departments, the two firms are mid-way through a two-year project to develop a model for automated identification of irregular water-quality events.

"Real Tech's partnership with Israel's national water company, Merokot, is a perfect example of how Ontario innovation and expertise is making a difference around the world. Ontario has some 900 innovative water-technology companies providing solutions at home and abroad. Through organizations like Ontario's WaterTAP, our government is taking a proactive role in helping these companies succeed on the world stage," Hoskins said.

"Before my trip this time, I didn't have an appreciation for how much progress and how much leadership exists in this tiny country in waste-water management. This year, more Israelis will get their water from desalination than they will from other sources," Hoskins said

"I went to a waste-water management facility and understanding how there's a deficit of water, but it's made up in Israel because you're able to effectively purify it and use it for agricultural purposes and also replenish your aquifers. It's amazing."

This wasn't Hoskins' first trip to Israel, and he said he was more than happy to be back. While he had time to find new food favourites – falafel and Israeli wine – he said his schedule was too packed to find time for a swim in the Mediterranean Sea, even if his hotel was on the beach. He did, however, manage a few jogs along Tel Aviv's promenade, which he said he loved.

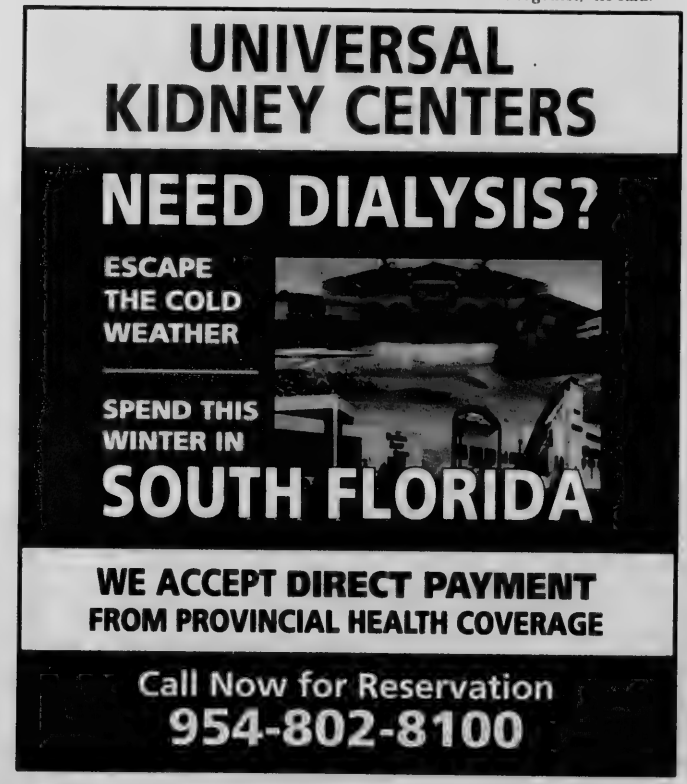
In addition to the WATEC conference, Hoskins met with the chief scientist at Israel's Commerce and Trade Ministry, and he visited the Israeli non-profit organizations Tmura and Access Israel.

Tmura is a venture fund that receives equity donations from Israeli and Israel-related high-tech companies and allocates the proceeds from sales of that equity to education- and youth-related charities in Israel. Google's recent purchase of Waze generated $1.5 million for the community.

Access Israel is a non-profit organization that promotes accessibility and strives to make Israel a place where people with various disabilities are integrated into society.

"There's a model that I think we can apply in Ontario in terms of the educational system and advocacy, to learn about the work being done on accessibility. I didn't expect to see that. It was a nice surprise, partly because it has given me some nice ideas to implement in Ontario," he said.

"There's a lot of room for growth. We've got this tremendous friendship, and now we've got an obligation, if not an opportunity, to build on that friendship in terms of strengthening economic ties and co-operation, and not just bilaterally but multilaterally as well."



Four mayors re-elected

JTA

JERUSALEM — The mayors of Israel's four largest cities, including Nir Barkat in Jerusalem, were returned to office in municipal elections.

Fewer than half of eligible Israeli voters turned out Oct. 22.

Barkat won 51 per cent of the vote to regain office. Turnout in Jerusalem was nearly 36 per cent, with most Arab citizens boycotting the vote.

Tel Aviv, Haifa and Rishon Letzion also re-elected incumbents. Tel Aviv Mayor Ron Huldai had 53 per cent of the vote.

Elsewhere, Ra'anana voters brought back former mayor Ze'ev Bielski, who served as an MK for the Kadima party between 2009 and 2013 and also chaired the Jewish Agency and the World Zionist Organization.

In Beit Shemesh, site of divisive conflicts between haredim and other residents, Shas-backed incumbent Moshe Abutbul was re-elected.

Sderot Mayor David Buskila, who has been the face of the southern Israeli community in recent years as it was battered by rockets fired from Gaza, lost a close race to modern Orthodox candidate Alon Davidi. Voters in three towns re-elected mayors who were accused of crimes. Among them was Bat Yam's Shlomo Lahiani, who was forced by the Supreme Court on Oct. 20 to resign due to an indictment filed against him.

Fashion website editor says a strong work ethic is key to success in her industry

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Becoming a fashion industry professional requires a lot more than having an interest in designer clothes and understanding how to put an outfit together, said Randi Bergman, online editor for FashionMagazine.com.

"I think people get caught up in the glamour and the fact that people from nowhere can make it," Bergman said.

"And that's all really important, but I think having more of an understanding and a strong work ethic really makes the difference between you being a fashion enthusiast and actually working in the industry."

Bergman, who has had the privilege of rubbing elbows with fashion legends including Christian Louboutin, Marc Jacobs and Michael Kors, said that while her position at FashionMagazine.com does present her with once-in-a-lifetime opportunities, it's also a demanding position.

"Whereas a traditional editor writes and edits and plans content, I'm doing so many other things, like programing websites, understanding trends, understanding stats, understanding the business side of it, understanding social media, really giving readers a lot more than I would if I worked in a traditional setting," the 28-year-old says.

"Everybody thinks your life is like Devil Wears Prada. Everybody seems to be really fixated on the fact that you get to go to fashion shows and you get free things and you get to travel. Those are all cool, but the number one perk of my job is just being able to do my job. I worked really hard to get here and... I'm really happy that I get to talk about fashion all the time."

She's had a short, yet impressive career that dates back to 2005, when she was a Ryerson University fashion communication student.

Through the program, which trained students in just about everything about the fashion industry except design, Bergman landed an internship at Fashion Magazine.

But before coming back for a full-time position in 2011, Bergman moved to New York, where she interned at Teen Vogue and Interview Magazine, and worked at Page Six Magazine and Fashion Week Daily.

When she moved back to Toronto, she got a job in Holt Renfrew's marketing department before coming full circle and landing back at Fashion Magazine.

Since then, Bergman has won the magazine two Proctor and Gamble Beauty and Grooming Awards for best fashion website.

Bergman's desire to carve out a career in the fashion world dates back to her high school days at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

"I always knew I wanted to do something creative, and I thought that fashion would be practical, which is funny. I thought it would be more practical than toiling away in a studio somewhere," she recalled.

She remembered an assignment for her 11th grade media class that required her to write an article about something related to her school.

"It had to be a critique, and I decided to critique the dress code, because I hated how people dressed." The article was later published in The CJN. That's when I decided that I wanted to be Carrie Bradshaw."

Although Bergman lives and breathes fashion, she said she has no desire to get into design.

"I love clothes, and I have a very specific esthetic, and very specific things that turn me on, but I'm not creative in that way. I really love to analyze it," she said.

Describing her own personal style, Bergman said it's anything but simple.

"I'm kind of a 'more is more' type of person. I love colours, I love prints, and I love mixing them all together… I love vintage and I love fashion history.

"I always try to do a little bit of surrealism, because that's kind of my favourite fashion history period. So I love buying things that take you a few minutes to understand what's going on."

She said her favourite piece she owns is a skirt by Carven, a decades-old French couture house rebranded by designer Guillaume Henry, which "looks like a Dutch master's painting."

"I really love things like that. I have a purse that looks like a candy wrapper, and another purse that looks like a glove and another purse that looks like a pair of lips – things that are a little bit weird, but really cool."

As for trends, Bergman said she is very excited about the fact that 1990s style is on its way back.

"I'm extremely head over heels into the'90s right now, like I can't get control of it. So, right now everything that I wear is pretty much '90s – from Winona Ryder in Reality Bites to [Beverly Hills:] 90210… Bodysuits, spaghetti straps, lingerie dresses, ruffles, fluorescent – I'm really into Tori Spelling right now."

Credited with revamping Fashion Magazine's online presence with her combination of humour and industry knowledge, Bergman said that in the years since the fashion world penetrated the virtual world, it's leveled the playing field for people who want to be part of the industry.

"It's opened the conversation to a lot of different people… You don't have to go through the same hoops [as you might have in the past.]"

Still, she insisted that there is a big difference between a fashion industry professional and someone who has a passion for designer labels.

FashionMagazine.com online editor Randi Bergman in Stockholm on a press trip.

"That doesn't mean you have to go to school for it, it just means you have to know a lot. It just means you have to educate yourself on where something came from. There's a reason why you like something and it's important that people understand that if you're going to work in fashion."

And, she added, "If you're not willing to work your ass off, it's not for you."

Young rabbi has big shoes to fill at Beth Tikvah

Ron Csillag
Special to The CJN

If the Guinness world records people kept track of this sort of thing, they would list Rabbi Jarrod Grover as the youngest spiritual leader of a North American synagogue with a membership of over 1,000 families.

The milestone is not recorded anywhere, and that suits Rabbi Grover just fine.

He's just 31 and although not shy about proclaiming his youth, he doesn't advertise it either.

"I'm not saying that as something to boast about," says the Montreal-born rabbi in his study at Beth Tikvah Synagogue in Toronto.

"I just know about it because I was really nervous to know that when I took this position."

After all, he had big shoes to fill. Rabbi Grover took over as senior rabbi of Beth Tikvah earlier this year when Rabbi Howard Markose – who had taken the reins for two interim years following the resignation of the shul's longtime spiritual leader, Rabbi Wayne Allen – returned to Israel.

Armed with a bachelor's degree in economics from Princeton University, Rabbi Grover was ordained at the Jewish Theological Seminary in 2009 and arrived at Beth Tikvah that summer as assistant rabbi.

"I get it all the time," he says with a smile. "People meet me for the first time and go, 'Oh my God, my son is older than you,' or 'I could be your grandmother!' Some people do see me that way. 'I'm your Bubbie, I'm looking out for you. We're so proud of you.' This is an older congregation. A lot of them do tend to look at me as the baby."

But his youth has also changed some perceptions at the 1,125-family member Conservative synagogue, founded in 1964.

For example, this year, he's running 12 conversion classes when many other rabbis have one or two at a time.

"If you ask the students, they say, 'We are more comfortable with you. We can talk to you. We can be ourselves. You are from our generation.' I think they do feel more comfortable with someone who's closer to their age," he says.

Rabbi Grover's enthusiasm for the job is obvious.

"I really am enthusiastic. I love my job. I love working with the conversion students. I love doing the weddings. I like working with people who are younger than me and who are my age," he says.

"I hope I have opened doors into Jewish life for people for whom the doors would not have been open if I was an older rabbi." But, he added, "I don't think I'm better at what I do because I'm younger. I'm still me."

He even doesn't seem to mind working "insane" hours. Like most of his colleagues in the pulpit, he's at work at 7:15 a.m. and though he may have lunch at home or a brief afternoon break, rarely leaves before 10 p.m. He and his wife Carmella have two children, Renee, who's 2 1/2, and Jonah, eight months.

Among his accomplishments, Rabbi Grover is especially proud of the shul's "Blue Jean Shabbat" program. It's an informal, interactive, family-centred Oneg Shabbat service featuring storytelling, trivia, music and dinner.

"To me, it was like a no-brainer when I came here," Rabbi Grover says. "We're building community through those programs. Young families are actually meeting other young families. That's where the commitment will come in the future."

In early 2012, Beth Tikvah became "Torah egalitarian," meaning women are allowed to participate in most aspects of the Torah service, including aliyot. But women do not count toward a minyan.

Is that an issue at the shul? "Oh, I think it is an issue," Rabbi Grover says. "Other Conservative shuls have changed their policy. I haven't felt any pressure here to do it.

"But every time we don't get a minyan, there's pressure. That tenth person, who happens to be a woman, is thinking to herself, 'What am I? Chopped liver?' [But] I am not at this time counting women in a minyan. It is not on my agenda and I don't have strong feelings about it. I really don't."

As for same-sex marriages, he says, "it's not really on the radar here."

Asked if he's more liberal than Rabbi Allen was, Rabbi Grover pauses.

"I think so," he replies. "Am I crazy more liberal than he was? No. I was brought here because I'm more traditional."

He describes Beth Tikvah as "centrist" – and that's "the hardest place to be. We're the only Conservative synagogue in this part of the city, the only shul in Willowdale. So I think we have to be centre of the road and accommodate people who are more traditional conservative and those who are more liberal. We try to find a balance."

On the other hand, "do I want to be all things to all people? No. But I really think there's more to be gained together than there is in picking one issue that's going to get people so upset that we're going to lose either all the traditionalists or all the liberals.

I don't think we're in a day and age where we should be taking sides to divide the community. We have too many important things on the agenda. We are losing Jews. People are walking away, not just from our shul, but from the community altogether."

He credits Rabbi Allen for hewing to tradition.

"He never dumbed down the service, never spoke to the lowest common denominator. Inclusivity was not his number one thing. It was totally OK for him to sit face to face with someone and say, 'You don't belong in this shul.' Inclusivity at any cost... It's not who we are.

"I think Judaism expects things of our congregants, and that is the message that I preach. I'm not going to dumb it down and, for instance, cut down the Torah reading because people are bored. I think it's God's expectation that we challenge ourselves. I have people here who feel the same I do, and that's why I'm lucky."

Results flow from Vaughan mission to Israel

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Things moved pretty quickly following a recent week-long economic mission to Israel sponsored by the City of Vaughan. Within days of the return of the 23-strong contingent, Centennial College, one of the participants, had signed seven memorandums of understanding (MOUs) with Israeli academic institutions.

The MOUs were concluded "with learning institutions and organizations in Israel... as part of a concerted effort by [Centennial] to enhance student mobility and learning internationally," the college said in a statement.

The agreements are meant to create linkages between Centennial and Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, Hadassah Academic College Jerusalem, the College of Law and Business, the Jerusalem College of Technology and Tel-Hai Academic College. In addition, there are new ties with the Magen David Adom, Israel's version of the Red Cross, and VARAM, Israel's board of public academic colleges.

"Centennial and other colleges are looking for new academic partners to enhance learning opportunities for their students, as well as opportunities for collaborative research, innovation and commercialization," Centennial said.

Vaughan city councillor Alan Shefman, who, along with Mayor Maurizio Bevilacqua, spearheaded the mission and accompanied it to Israel, said that's just the kind of outcome he'd been looking for.

Vaughan has been working on a new economic development plan geared to increasing economic ties with three countries: Israel, Italy and China. The idea is to bring together Canadian and foreign firms, along with educational institutions, who can partner in pursuing business opportunities. On the educational front, it was hoped that it would lead to student exchanges and training programs, he said.

During the trip to Israel, organizers arranged 160 meetings with local companies and agencies, most of them one-on-one sessions, Shefman stated.

ColdSpring Commerce, a Canadian company that specializes in facilitating business partnerships, created the network that brought together Canadian and Israeli participants. "They were critical to the success of the program as they were on the ground in Israel," Shefman said.

The initiative was mounted in co-operation with Israel's Toronto consulate, the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce.

"Any trade collaboration has to be mutually beneficial. This is the philosophy I bring to international trade for the city. It has to be a win-win that fosters further growth and expands both economies," Bevilacqua said.

Mayor Maurizio Bevilacqua, right, with Amos Harel, one of Israel's leading media experts on military and defence issues, at a briefing during the Vaughan economic mission to Israel.

"Israel is a country that is widely admired," particularly for its advances in the tech sector," he added.

One of the Canadian participants, Gino Di Rezze, founder of Groundheat Systems, was impressed at the vitality of Israeli entrepreneurs.

"I was excited seeing the energy of a small country. It was amazing," he said.

Di Rezze participated in one-on-one meetings that appear to have already spawned business relationships. In conjunction with an Israeli company, Groundheat is bidding on the installation of a geothermal power plant in a government building near the Knesset in Jerusalem.

The company's Rome office is also partnering with an Israeli firm to bid on installing a geothermal plant at an Israeli army base, Di Rezze said.

Shefman said Canadian participants represented a wide range of industries, from those specializing in security products, to metal fabricators, to investment funds.

Shefman said one Israeli company, A.B.A. Science Play, produces "high-end, scientific playgrounds" that add an educational element to children's playground activities.

"They're looking to establish a Canadian office in Vaughan," Bevilacqua said.

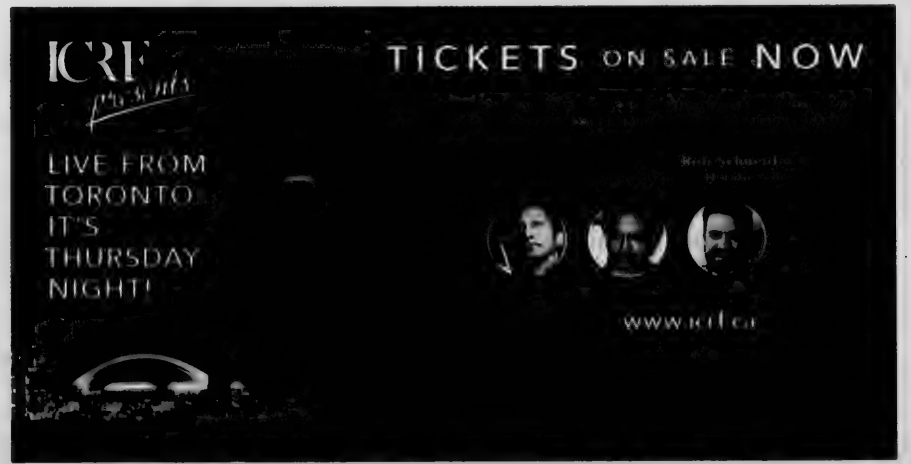
Another Israeli company that participated in the meetings makes an advanced automated parking system that moves cars to designated spots on a conveyor system and does not require a driver. It's a real money-saver, said Shefman, since it reduces the costs of excavating underground parking and allows more cars to use less space.

Canadians can offer their marketing and management skills to the roll-out of those sorts of products, or perhaps provide infusions of capital to develop them. For its part, Vaughan can serve as "a jump-off point in North America," providing a base from which Israeli firms, with a limited local customer base, can sell to a huge market, Shefman said.

Adding to the Vaughan sales pitch is the fact that many Israelis are quite familiar with the community.

"You can't believe the number of Israelis who have knowledge and connections to Toronto and Thornhill," Shefman said. "Then you start playing Jewish geography with them. It's a huge issue that we have a significant Israeli population that helps for familiarity. The fact we have a dynamic Jewish community adds value to them. They're not going to unfamiliar territory."

As part of the initiative, Vaughan will open a business development office in Tel Aviv, "to show Israel's business community we're serious and to continue to build relationships," said Shefman.



Smart car developed in Herzliya

David Shamah
The Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — The flying cars promised by science fiction aren't quite ready yet, but automakers like General Motors have a pretty acceptable consolation prize: a smart, self-driving, self-parking car equipped with a wealth of sensors and communications equipment that aims to make accidents a thing of the past.

For GM, much of the technology needed for the vehicle of the future is being developed at its Israel research and development facility.

"The technologies that will power autonomous vehicles, including smart sensing, vision imaging, human machine interface, Wi-Fi and 4G/LTE communications, much of that is being done at our Herzliya facility, in conjunction with GM's other R and D facility in Silicon Valley," said Gil Golan, director of GM's Advanced Technical Center (ATC) in Israel.

"The industry is being driven by customer preference and to keep up, we need to develop these technologies and ensure we are meeting customer demand. To stay on top of the market you have to be versatile, and the Israel ATC helps the company to do that."

"We started working in Israel nearly 20 years ago with some limited projects, but we ramped up activities here in 2007 and have been going strong ever since," Golan said. "Israel is a very important location for GM."

According to Golan, connectivity will be key for cars in the next five model years.

"Cars today are very sophisticated, much more than they used to be," he said. "Modern cars have as many as 100 systems controlled by computers or processors." That includes the engine, braking system, cooling system, steering and suspension and transmission.

A self-driving car might be designed to automatically stop at red lights, or stay within the speed limit. Sensors could alert drivers when a tire is about to hit the curb when they are parallel parking. A video camera could detect when a vehicle gets too close to the one in front and automatically reduce speed to ensure a safe gap. In-dash apps could let drivers communicate with others on the road, getting information about traffic, accidents, services, and other useful information.

Much of the technology to do this already exists, said Golan, having been developed in the past for smartphones. In fact, he said, the smartphone is the model for the car of the future.

"What customers are asking for are super smartphones on wheels," Golan said.

Study looks at Jewishness as an ethnic identity

Views & Reviews
Martin Lockshin

Jewish Identities in Postcommunist Russia and Ukraine: An Uncertain Ethnicity
Zvi Gitelman
Cambridge University Press

Social scientists have developed a useful distinction between Judaism and Jewishness. Judaism is identifying with either: (1) Jewish religious beliefs and/or practices, or (2) Jewish nationhood, or (3) both. Jewishness is relating to one's Jewish identity as an ethnicity, with no religious or national component.

But what is the nature and significance of Jewish ethnic identity? An important new book by Prof. Zvi Gitelman of the University of Michigan explores this issue, focusing on the survival of ethnic Jewishness in the former Soviet Union (FSU).

Jewish Identities in Postcommunist Russia and Ukraine: An Uncertain Ethnicity opens with the intriguing line: "Things did not turn out as they were supposed to: ethnic groups were supposed to disappear. Marxists, western liberals and social scientists agreed on that, but for different reasons." And yet, ethnic identity survives for Jews and other groups in many parts of the world, including Canada and the FSU.

Gitelman and his team conducted detailed surveys of large groups of Jews in Russia and Ukraine in the 1990s. Their results are organized into useful charts that show differences both over time and between Russia and the Ukraine. Gitelman puts these survey results into perspective through a learned analysis of the history of Russian Jewry, of anti-Semitism, and of the disputes in Jewish communities throughout the world about the connection between religion, nationalism and Jewish identity. Gitelman's scholarly training in all these areas – and also in classical Judaica and in Hebrew, Yiddish and Slavic languages – allows him to write authoritatively on these topics. (Sadly not every scholar who studies the sociology of modern Jews has this array of skills.)

Aside from appealing to those who want to understand more about the Jews who are left in the FSU, I believe the book is surprisingly significant for North American Jews, too.

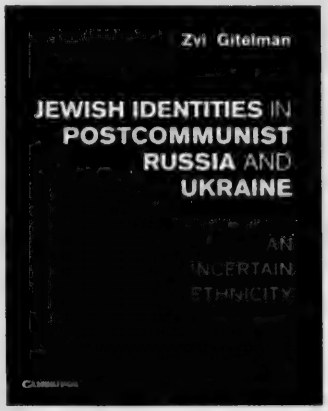
The Jews remaining in the FSU in the 1990s were anomalous. Jewish religious, cultural and national life had been supressed during most of the years of Communist control. After perestroika and later the fall of communism, those Jews with the strongest religious and/or national identity quickly took the opportunity to emigrate. This left behind an assortment of Jews who, in general, had little significant Jewish knowledge, religious commitment or connection to Zionism.

Nevertheless, Gitelman's statistics show that many still see themselves as Jews and, for the most part, feel positively inclined to that identity. But what that identity actually consists of is difficult to say. The factor cited by FSU Jews most often as underlying their Jewish identity is anti-Semitism. They see themselves as Jewish because they or others they know have been victims of anti-Semitism.

When Gitelman and his team dug a little more deeply, they did not find any significant manifestations of that Jewishness. In their surveys, they gave FSU Jews a list of "components" and asked them which ones were essential to Jewishness. In Russia in 1997, only four components were seen by a non-trivial number of respondents as "essential to Jewishness": "be proud of one's Jewish nationality" (22.9 per cent); "not hide one's Jewishness" (20.8 per cent); "defend Jewish honour and dignity" (17.3 per cent); and "remember the Holocaust" (15.1 per cent). Belief in God fared poorly – it was seen as essential to Jewishness by a mere 4.2 per cent of FSU Jews. Most traditional manifestations of Jewish religious or national identity received scores barely above zero: "know a Jewish language" (1.1 per cent); "circumcise one's son" (0.1 per cent); "give children Jewish education" (0.8 per cent); "marry a Jew" (1.1 per cent).

Gitelman's dispassionate analysis of intermarriage is extensive – he provides a historical background of Jewish attitudes to it, which for two or more millennia were universally condemnatory. He also shows statistically that the divorce rate in various countries is higher among the intermarried and that in Russia and Ukraine, self-assessments of marital happiness are lower among the intermarried. Yet it is not surprising that among Jews with only an ethnic attachment to Judaism and no sense of loyalty or obligation to traditional Jewish values, romantic love trumps ethnicity.

The statistic that shocked me most concerned the attitude of FSU Jews to "Jews" who practise a religion other than Judaism. Gitelman shows how, throughout Jewish history, practising a religion other than Judaism was seen unambiguously, even by modern non-religious Israelis, as essentially leaving the fold. But for the majority of FSU Jews, a Jew practising Christianity is seen as a matter of indifference. The logic of such an outlook is clear: if Judaism is simply an ethnic identity, certainly people of one ethnicity can practise any number of religions.



As I read these statistics, I began to wonder whether here in North America, a similar acceptance of what was always called "apostasy" will become normal among our own ethnic Jews. I did not have to wonder for long. The New York Times of Oct. 1, citing a survey of the Pew Research Center, reports that 34 per cent of U.S. Jews claim that you can still be Jewish if you believe that Jesus was the messiah, and a similar percentage (perhaps the same Jews?) have a Christmas tree in their homes.

Reading this book teaches that while ethnic identity does survive longer than experts expected, it is almost always shallow and content-free. Perhaps this book will serve as a wake-up call to all who think that ethnic Jewishness will contribute in any significant way to the survival of our people.

TAKING SIDES EXAMINES DEEDS OF GERMAN ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR

Wilhelm Furtwangler, principal conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra from 1922 to 1945, received many government honours and appointments under the Nazi regime, but also used his influence to save hundreds of Jewish musicians from the concentration camps.

In his play Taking Sides, Ronald Harwood focuses on a 1946 investigation to determine whether Furtwangler used his artistic genius to glorify the Nazi's destructive ideology, or whether, as he insisted, he remained in Germany to safeguard a musical tradition and bring comfort to the German people with his music.

Stage Centre Productions and Chicken Coop Theatre presents Taking Sides for five performances only at the Al Green Theatre, Miles Nadal JCC, 750 Spadina Ave., Nov. 6 to 9. $27.50, $22. Strong language; not suitable for children. 647-831-3980.

Names in the News: Robert Singer, CEO of the World Jewish Congress, sent a request to online bookseller Amazon.com on Oct. 14 to stop selling books that deny the Holocaust and promote anti-Semitism and white supremacy. The firm had quickly responded to a previous request in 2008, so the WJC announced it was "shocked and disgusted" on Oct. 17 that Amazon had not yet removed the items.

"No one should profit from the sale of such vile and offensive hate literature," Singer wrote to Amazon CEO Jeff Bezos. "Many Holocaust survivors are deeply offended by the fact that the world's largest online retailer is making money from selling such material."

Passages: When Morris Biderman arrived in Toronto from Poland in 1920, he was a triple outsider: an immigrant, a Jew and poor. The son of a rag-picker, he left school at 16 and began peddling newspapers on the street. "I did not need to look far for reasons to become involved with socialism," he wrote in his 2000 autobiography, A Life On The Jewish Left: An Immigrant's Experience.

Biderman, who died in Toronto on Oct. 14 at the age of 105, worked for the communistic United Jewish People's Order from an early age. But when he joined J.B. Salsberg and others on a fact-finding mission to the Soviet Union in 1956, he, along with Salsberg, returned utterly disillusioned with the Stalinist regime, having realized it had been murdering and persecuting Jews and trying to sweep these crimes under the rug. That knowledge led Salsberg, Biderman and others to make a famous and highly controversial break from the UJPO to found the New Fraternal Jewish Association (NFJA) in 1960.

The event caused an enormous rupture in the Jewish left across Canada.

"They felt that much of what they had been told [by Moscow] over the previous two decades had been false, just a bunch of lies," said David Abramowitz, UJPO's longtime president.

"When they left UJPO, they took about 200 members with them, and there was a great dichotomy in the membership. The animosities were great, and horrible accusations were slung back and forth. For four years that carried on, and some people continued the animosities and never forgot about 'those traitors that had left.'"

On the belief that culture was the best way to attract young people, Biderman helped establish UJPO's youth movement, as well as its Youth Singers and Folk Singers, who toured across Canada. Later he helped put Yiddish cultural values at the forefront of the NFJA.

According to Abramowitz, Biderman was instrumental in establishing Friends of Yiddish, the Committee for Yiddish, the annual summer concert at Earl Bales Park and other mainstays of the Toronto Jewish cultural scene.

Biderman operated a small printing shop, but worked his entire life in furtherance of socialist and communist ideals. "Am I sorry for having belonged to the party for 30 years?" he wrote.

"[M]y answer is no. I am not sorry… I was working day to day among comrades and friends for an organization and cause I believed in."

Ger Mandolin Orchestra pays homage to E. Europe

Jordan Adler
Special to the CJN

A few years ago, Avner Yonai flew to Góra Kalwaria, the Polish village where his grandfather lived before moving to Palestine in 1932.

Góra Kalwaria is known as Ger in Yiddish. When Yonai arrived there, one of the two Jews who still reside in the town, Henryk Prajs, showed him a tattered photograph of Yonai's grandfather and other family members from the early 1930s playing in the town's mandolin orchestra.

Today, the Israeli-born Yonai, who lives in the San Francisco area, is the founder of an updated Ger Mandolin Orchestra (GMO), which he created as an homage to the popular eastern European musical styles and a memorial to his family. This contemporary GMO will perform for the first time in Canada on Nov. 7 at the Toronto Centre for the Arts. The event is tied into Holocaust Education Week.

"My immediate idea was to make a modern orchestra playing the same repertoire that [such an] orchestra might have played at that time," Yonai says.

This updated band of musicians formed in 2011, after Yonai got in touch with Mike Marshall, a Grammy-nominated mandolin player.

"[Marshall] was the one to make the call to most of the musicians who came on board," Yonai says.

Marshall recruited 10 other musicians, including Toronto's Eric Stein, artistic director of the Ashkenaz Foundation, a non-profit organization that showcases Yiddish and Jewish art forms, such as klezmer music. Stein is also the only Canadian in the orchestra and credits the presence of Ashkenaz and its music festivals as an inspiration to helping him as a musician.

Influence of mandolins continues in Poland today

"Getting into the instrument, I was really astounded by how many different styles of music are played on the mandolin," he says. "[Ashkenaz] opened my mind to the possibilities of using the mandolin as a vehicle for expression within Jewish musical traditions."

Klezmer music was a central part of Jewish culture in eastern Europe before the Holocaust. The mandolin was also a popular instrument for immigrant communities in North America.

GMO first performed at the Jewish Music Festival in Berkeley, Calif., in March 2011.

"We had many Holocaust survivors in the audience," Yonai recalls. "We had a full house, and a lot of them knew the songs that were played by our orchestra. Some of them sang along. It was very heartwarming."

Góra Kalwaria's mayor later invited the orchestra to perform in the Polish town. The group has not performed as a whole since their concert in Poland two years ago.

"We performed in the town, in the old synagogue – a broken-down old building that hadn't had a crowd in it for probably 70 years," Stein says. "This tradition of mandolin orchestras has actually continued in Poland to this day, without the Jewish influence."

During GMO's stay in Poland, the 11 musicians who comprise the band did a workshop with around 200 Polish student musicians. Now, many of these orchestras play arrangements of Jewish music in their repertoires.

"It's pretty cool that they were getting their own education about how significant the Jewish influence was musically, culturally, historically in their own country," Stein says.

"It's a really accessible way for young people, Jewish or non-Jewish, to memorialize the role that Jewish people played in Polish life for so many years."

Holocaust survivors who show up to the Toronto event will get free admission. Stein is also working on giving away free tickets to students and youth groups interested in learning about musical culture during Holocaust Education Week.

"[The survivors] appreciate it as something that is nostalgic and meaningful for them, connoting the world that they came from in Europe," Stein says.

"It's a great way to connect young musicians who are working in older musical traditions that reflect Jewish musicals styles to connect to an audience of survivors."

The current incarnation of the Ger Mandolin Orchestra

There's not much historical evidence of the songs that the original GMO played. Yonai wants people to go to their attics and take out old albums of family who arrived in Canada from Poland and other eastern European countries.

Yonai says he wants to see if there is sheet music, pictures or playbills from mandolin orchestras before the war. He hopes to authenticate the new GMO's repertoire with some of these songs. People who find artifacts can contact him at ayonai@hotmail.com.
